THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTIETH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 25 JUNE 1987]

THIRTY-SEVENTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 133

SIXTEENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1987-88

House of Commons

Monday 9 May 1988

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Energy Production

1. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the nation's energy production is provided by the private sector; and what was the proportion in 1979.

19. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the nation's energy production is provided by the private sector; and what was the proportion in 1979.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Cecil Parkinson): Provisional figures indicate that the private sector currently accounts for 70 per cent. of indigenous production of primary fuels, compared with 55 per cent. in 1979.

In terms of final energy consumption met by the private sector, that represents an increase from 41 per cent. in 1979 to 73 per cent. now. After the privatisation of the electricity supply industry that figure should rise to 87 per cent.

Mr. Forth: I thank my right hon. Friend for that most encouraging reply. Will he confirm his belief that this process has been good for both the consumer and the country as a whole, and will he say whether he has any immediate or long-term plans to extend that proportion of private provision even further?

Mr. Parkinson: The Government have made their position clear. They believe that energy provision, as well as most other industrial and commercial activities, are best carried on by the private sector, and we shall be pursuing that policy with the other industries for which, at present, we have no immediate plans for privatisation.

Mr. Hunter: Although I quite unreservedly welcome and applaud the private sector's increased role in energy production, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to comment on the successful implementation of the Government's wish to see increased competition in energy production?

Mr. Parkinson: As my hon. Friend knows, a prime purpose of our electricity privatisation proposals is to create competition in generation. We believe that, in the long term, that offers the best prospects for keeping down prices to the consumer.

Neighbourhood Energy Action

2. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what level of grant he has approved for neighbourhood energy action and energy action Scotland in 1988-89.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Peter Morrison): My Department's grant to neighbourhood energy action will be £392,000 and to energy action Scotland £68,000.

Mr. Knapman: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will he confirm that those figures represent an increase, and will he tell us what part the private sector plays in those projects?

Mr. Morrison: I confirm that those figures are an increase. Last year we paid £341,000 to neighbourhood energy action and £57,000 to energy action Scotland, so there are increases of about 15 and 19 per cent. respectively. The private sector plays a part, but I have made it clear that I hope that next year the two bodies will be able to encourage the private sector to play a substantially increased part.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The Minister may be aware that, under the new employment training programme, there is worry that funding will not be sufficient for energy projects and that approved training organisations will not be keen to keep them going? Will he liaise with officials at the Department of Employment about that, and has he any helpful advice to offer for those projects?

Mr. Morrison: I appreciate, as does the hon. Gentleman, that negotiations must take place as a result of the change, but I am assured that the Manpower Services Commission is keen to ensure that those projects are able to continue.

Electricity Supplies

3. Mr. Tam Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply of 28 March, Official Report, columns 719-20, what consideration he has given to the implications for the promptness with which electricity supplies can be called up in an emergency by the grid controllers, of possible differences in interpretation of the contractual obligations to be placed on private generating companies; what assessment he has made of the effects on the cost of operating the grid of changing to a contractual relationship between the grid controllers and private suppliers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: All generators will have a commercial and contractual interest in ensuring that the power supply system does not fail in an emergency. Operating procedures in emergencies will be set out clearly in their contracts, and the ability of the grid controllers to manage emergencies should be unaffected. We believe that any costs will be outweighed by the benefits of competition and diversity.

Mr. Dalyell: Why do the Government think that they know better than Lord Marshall?

Mr. Parkinson: The Government think that they know better than Lord Marshall because, although he is a learned and powerful figure in the industry, he is only one voice. There are many other people in the industry who know just as much about transmission as he does and who do not agree with him. The president of the Institution of Electrical Engineers does not agree with him. Our professional advisers advised us that what we wished to do was technically possible. Lord Marshall accepts that it is technically possible. He believes that costs will be involved. We believe that those costs are sustainable and will be more than outweighed by the savings from diversity.

Mr. Rost: What assessment has my right hon. Friend made of the benefits that will result when area boards are able to use the grid to shop around for competitive contracts from new private producers?

Mr. Parkinson: We think that that is precisely the sort of competition and diversity of supply of electricity that will give rise to competition in prices and will benefit the customer. That will compensate for some of the possible additional costs of ensuring that the system remains safe.

Mr. Prescott: The technical argument over whether the Secretary of State or Lord Marshall is right will continue, but can the right hon. Gentleman assure us that it is still his belief that prices will be cheaper under the privatisation system and grid separation? He may have seen a recent report by National Utility Services Ltd.—it was produced two days ago—that electricity prices under privatisation will be far more expensive than hitherto and are likely to be the most expensive in Europe.

Mr. Parkinson: The company to which the hon. Gentleman referred is not entirely unbiased in this instance. It makes its living by giving advice on how to reduce power bills. It therefore has a vested interest in pretending that the bills are extremely high. It has an entirely unrepresentative sample of customers and we prefer to believe the CBI and the Electricity Council, which have agreed figures. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on discovering—wrongly in this instance—an enthusiasm for the private sector.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

5. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many flue gas desulphurisation units are being fitted to coal-fired power stations.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Michael Spicer): The CEGB has announced plans to retrofit FGD equipment to the six generating units at Drax power station and four generating units at Fiddler's Ferry. In addition, FGD equipment will be fitted to the generating units of all new coal-fired power stations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This equipment is essential to prevent acid rain, but is my hon. Friend aware that each unit consumes 300,000 tonnes of limestone a year? This has to be quarried at places such as the Mendip Hills in my constituency. Will my hon. Friend take this environmental damage into account in deciding which type of power station to order in future?

Mr. Spicer: I can give my hon. Friend a number of assurances. First, there is no question of the Mendip Hills being used for the extraction of limestone for this purpose. Nor is there any question of national parks being used. I understand that less than 0·3 per cent. of the limestone that is nationally produced is used for each power station.

Sir Trevor Skeet: Will my hon. Friend give me advice on the cost of removal of sulphur dioxide and NOx from a 2,000 MW power station? Obviously this will increase the cost considerably.

Mr. Spicer: The best available figure for a 2,000 MW power station is £200 million.

Electricity Industry

6. Mr Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received about statutory obligations and supply regulations in the electricity supply industry following privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: I have received many representations on electricity privatisation, including comments on the proposed revisions to the electricity supply regulations.

Mr. Thurnham: In looking ahead to 1992, can my right hon. Friend say whether reciprocal registration agreements will be used with our European partners, most of whom, I understand, require registration now?

Mr. Parkinson: This is strictly a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who is dealing with this aspect of 1992. We have a meeting arranged with the Electrical Contractors Association, and I shall be interested to hear the views of its members.

Mr. Cryer: Does the Secretary of State agree that privatisation and competition involve cost-cutting exercises to increase profits? That is the main motivation of running private concerns rather than services. What guarantee does he have that directors in the privatised sector will not be as incompetent and criminally irresponsible as the directors of Townsend Thoresen?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman is making the mistake of assuming that profits can come only from what he describes as cost cutting, which implies sacking employees and behaving anti-socially. Operating efficiently can provide a useful source of profits and a useful source of help for the customer, who enjoys a keener price.

Mr. Andy Stewart: When the supply regulations are introduced after privatisation, will British Coal be allowed to compete fairly and equally with foreign imports, which can be dumped here in the short term to decimate the British industry before prices are increased?

Mr. Parkinson: My hon. Friend knows that there is a huge market for coal that will exist way into the foreseeable future. Most of our electricity will come from coal. The Government have invested more than £9 billion in the past nine years to ensure that we have a modern, efficient British coal industry. Therefore, there is a market and the industry has been given the investment. If that is used properly, the British coal industry has nothing to fear.

Mr. Prescott: Will the Secretary of State confirm that his consultative document, in which he promised new rights for consumers, includes provision in the regulations for the duty to supply—which may be prosecuted for at the moment—to be prosecuted only through civil actions agreed by the director general of electricity supply? Will he also confirm that the duty to supply will now be reduced to supply on reasonable terms? Finally, will he confirm that the right to disconnect—which is qualified at the moment—will be unqualified? That is clearly a reduction of consumers' rights and in conflict with the Secretary of State's promise in his White Paper.

Mr. Parkinson: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman got those findings. No decisions have been taken on those matters. We are in the middle of a process of consultation about the possible supply regulations and no decisions of any kind have been taken. They will be taken after consultation.

Electricity Costs

8. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has in drawing up the regulatory framework for the electricity industry to include energy efficiency as an option for ensuring that electricity is supplied to the consumer at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The details of the regulatory framework, including their effect on energy efficiency are being considered with the Department's advisers. The regulatory system will encourage the industry to meet its customers' requirements at least cost.

Mr. Hannam: While welcoming my hon. Friend's reply confirming that energy efficiency is one of the options under consideration, may I ask whether he accepts that if we are trying to achieve the right balance between low-cost electricity for the consumer and profitability for the utilities, the means of ensuring energy efficiency must be included in the powers given to the regulator and they must be strong enough to ensure efficiency at the generating and distribution ends?

Mr. Spicer: I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend said and we shall bear his remarks closely in mind. Our regulatory framework will be designed to promote energy efficiency through competition, especially among generating companies.

Mr. Darling: Is the Minister still convinced that the insistence on providing a substantial proportion of electricity generation through the nuclear industry is the best means of providing low-cost electricity, especially in view of the difficulties and unknown costs of decommissioning and in light of this morning's report in The Guardian which suggests that nuclear power stations are running at below their generating capacity because of loading and unloading difficulties?

Mr. Spicer: The Government's position on that is quite clear. We believe that there should be a minimum of nuclear energy in this country, for efficiency reasons. Also, there is no way in which we can tell at the moment what the price of fossil fuels will be in 20 years' time. Therefore, there is a very good reason for nuclear energy on economic grounds. Leaving that aside, we believe that there should be a thriving nuclear industry, to ensure that we have a wide variety of energy sources.

Mr. Jack: What steps is my hon. Friend taking to ensure that all branches of the Government respond enthusiastically to offers of private sector money to invest in energy-saving measures?

Mr. Spicer: The first step that I can take is to ensure that my hon. Friend's remarks are widely read.

Mr. John Garrett: Will the Minister agree that for years the Government have claimed that their objective is to make Britain the most energy-efficient nation and that the Prime Minister set us a target of a saving of £7 billion on fuel bills? How will that be achieved unless the regulatory body has very strong powers and a duty to promote energy conservation? Is it not a fact that the present Secretary of State for Energy has much less interest in and commitment to energy efficiency than his predecessor had?

Mr. Spicer: I listend carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) and to what the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) has just said about the need for efficiency as one of the criteria within the regulatory regime. I must repeat that a prime way of achieving efficiency, at least thermal efficiency, is through competition among generators, and we shall ensure that the regulatory regime includes that.

Fast Breeder Reactor, Dounreay

9. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future funding of the fast breeder reactor project at Dounreay, Scotland.

Mr. Parkinson: My Department reviews its expenditure on research and development each year, including that on the fast reactor. All options are considered, but no decisions have yet been taken.

Mr. Haynes: I know what the Secretary of State is up to. I can read it like a book, and I can read him like a book, too. There is a cut back on the financing of future projects. The same is true of research and development.

Mr. Parkinson indicated dissent.

Mr. Haynes: The Secretary of State should not look surprised. We know what is going on. The Government are cutting back on expenditure with a view to privatisation, so that they can have a cheap rake-off in other public industries. Here we go again, this time with electricity.

Mr. Speaker: Briefly, please.

Mr. Haynes: I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Secretary of State to come off it and to be honest at the Dispatch Box with the people of this nation.

Mr. Parkinson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his brevity and for the quietness with which he asked his question. This matter is in no way connected with the privatisation of electricity. The only connection is that the CEGB has been funding 30 per cent. of the cost of the fast reactor. The fact that it has taken a decision about its expenditure in no way affects the overall decision on the fast reactor. It is a complex issue and one to which we are giving serious consideration. It also has international aspects. Above all, it has enormous implications for the people of Caithness and Sutherland. We recognise our obligations to them, and when I am ready I shall come to the House with a statement about our policy. We are not ready to do so yet, and we are not prepared to be bounced by inaccurate newspaper articles.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Mr. Maclennan: I thank the Secretary of State for his robust recognition of his obligations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not able to hear the hon. Member. I shall have to call him on another question, because this matter is to be raised on the Adjournment.

Magnox Reactors

11. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what recent information he has received from the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate about the future decommissioning of Magnox nuclear reactors.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The future of the Magnox nuclear power stations in the United Kingdom is a matter for the operators concerned, subject to their meeting the requirements of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

Mr. Cook: I should like to be able to thank the Minister for that reply, but there is not a great deal for which I can thank him. It was a fairly empty statement. Can the Minister tell the House whether he is prepared to require the NII to consider the option, on decommissioning Magnox stations, of strengthening their primary and secondary cladding to improve the integrity of their structure, and perhaps use the redundant, cavernous capacity of disused turbine halls for storing—under managed, monitorable and redeemable circumstances—the nuclear waste that is causing so much trouble? It would not have to be transported all over the country to new sites because we would have on site the expertise to do the job that needs to be done.

Mr. Spicer: The hon. Gentleman is extremely knowledgeable in these matters and has demonstrated his knowledge on this occasion. The Government do not tell the NII what it should do about its inspections, because the NII sets its own standards. We have full confidence in it and have made sure that it is fully staffed. The NII is the Government's expert body for ensuring standards, and we give it every support in maintaining those standards.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Minister received representations from the private sector on electricity generation under the fast breeder reactor programme? Will he place on record the statement that the FBR programme has been, and continues to be, a useful programme?

Mr. Spicer: I believe that that relates to the previous question and not to this one, which is about Magnox stations. They have nothing to do with fast breeder reactors.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: No, I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It was absolutely in order.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Alexander Eadie.

South of Scotland Electricity Board

12. Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has been informed by British Coal of progress made in its meetings with the South of Scotland Electricity Board regarding future coal burn at power stations.

Mr. Parkinson: These negotiations are a commercial matter for the two industries concerned, but I have asked to be kept informed.

Mr. Eadie: Does the Secretary of State not agree that, in the midst of the negotiations with British Coal, the South of Scotland Electricity Board is being provocative and threatening? We have learnt that between 20,000 and 30,000 tonnes of foreign coal are now at Rotterdam awaiting delivery to the SSEB in small cargoes, and that 3,000 tonnes have already arrived at the Kincardine power station in Scotland. Did the Secretary of State not endorse the three-month agreement to halt foreign coal imports, to give time for British Coal and the SSEB to reach an agreement on coal burning in this country?

Mr. Parkinson: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have made my position very clear. I cannot force either party to reach an agreement, although I should like them to do so, and I have been doing all that I can to encourage them. The negotiations are in hand, and I hope that they will be successful.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Secretary of State aware that the SSEB is among the generating boards that are impressed not only by coal burn rates but by the burn-up rate of the fast breeder reactor—which is why it has put its weight behind the project for the future?

Mr. Parkinson: Yes. I want to make it clear that we wish to retain the fast breeder reactor technology for this country. The question is how we do that in the most economic way possible. As I said in answer to an earlier question, we are looking at all the aspects of the problem very carefully. I look forward to discussions with the hon. Gentleman when he comes to see me tomorrow.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

13. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has recently discussed with the Central Electricity Generating Board its proposals for flue gas desulphurisation to reduce acid rain.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are fully aware that the CEGB plans to fit FGD equipment at a cost of £600 million to 6GW of existing plant as well as on all new coal-fired stations.

Mr. Pike: In view of the growing concern about acid rain, both in this country and elsewhere in Europe, is the Minister satisfied that the CEGB is proceeding with the work as speedily as possible? Does the Minister not believe that it may be necessary to take action on some of the other power stations?

Mr. Spicer: The United Kingdom now has a 10-year sulphur dioxide emission control programme costing about £1 billion. We accept that that speed is appropriate for controlling emissions. It is not often realised that Britain has reduced its emissions by 40 per cent. since 1970, and by 25 per cent. by 1980. We have done a tremendous amount already to reduce emissions, and we intend to continue the programme.

Mr. Butler: My constituents will be very grateful for the £200 million investment in Fiddler's Ferry, but when my hon. Friend next meets the CEGB will he suggest that some disruption may be caused to the local community in Cuerdley and ask the CEGB to minimise that disruption?

Mr. Spicer: I am sure that the CEGB will read carefully in Hansard what my hon. Friend has said. The matter is clearly causing some local concern, and I am sure that the CEGB will be aware of that.

Mr. Patchett: With gas desulphurisation in mind, has the Minister discussed the future of the fluidised bed experiment at Grimethorpe, in my constituency? Will he make a statement?

Mr. Spicer: I am afraid that I cannot make a statement now, but the Grimethorpe plant is being considered very carefully.

Coal Industry

14. Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, how much has been invested in the coal industry since April 1979.

Mr. Parkinson: Since 1979 the Government have provided British Coal with £9 billion of grants—together with substantial loan finance—of which £6 billion has been spent on capital investment.

Mr. Knight: Is not a healthy economy one of the prerequisites of any Government policy of substantial and continuing investment? Should not those who work in the coal mining industry be grateful to the Government, not only for supporting worthwhile investment, but for helping to create an excellent economic outlook for Britain? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the biggest threat to the industry and to jobs within it comes from those who instigate unnecessary strike action, such as Mr. Arthur Scargill, and those who support such action, such as the Leader of the Opposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. Parkinson: We shall all be voting for the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott).

It is important that modern working practices go with capital investment and that strikes and waste are eliminated. Provided that we have modern working practices to go with modern machinery, I see a very bright future for British Coal, but every strike and work to rule lessens the prospects for the industry.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Secretary of State concede that a substantial proportion of the investment in Scotland has been in the Longannett complex, and that that investment has been endangered by the cavalier attitude of the South of Scotland Electricity Board in importing foreign coal at dumped prices? I recognise that the Secretary of State has shown an interest in this matter, but what steps is he taking to protect the nation's investment in the Scottish coalfields —an investment that can get a return only if the coal is burnt in SSEB stations?

Mr. Parkinson: There are two things in our proposals which I believe will improve the prospects for the Scottish coal industry. First, we are strengthening the inter-connector to England and Wales, which means that there is a big potential market for the electricity produced from Scottish coal. Secondly—and I am pleased to say that Scottish miners have shown great good sense about this—we are encouraging the adoption of modern working practices.

Although the investment has been made, Scottish coal is still relatively expensive. Therefore, we have to find ways of reducing the costs and opening up for Scotland the prospects of a good market. We are also encouraging the two parties to get together. I believe that the Government are doing what they can to ensure a good future for Scottish coal.

Mr. Gow: Despite my right hon. Friend's legitimate pride in the amount invested in the British coal industry during the past nine years, will he confirm that the whole of that investment could have been made by the private sector? What greater justification is there for retaining the ownership of British Coal in the public sector compared with the Government's conviction that the oil industry should be in the private sector?

Mr. Parkinson: We have no plans at present, but it is our ambition that all the energy industries should be returned to the private sector. However, there is a limit to what we can do at any given time. I believe that privatising the electricity supply industry is a big enough job for us at present. I assure my hon. Friend that we have ambitions for the rest of the industries for which we are responsible.

Magnox Reactors

15. Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received about the share of the costs of maintaining and decommissioning Magnox reactors to be borne by the privatised electricity supply industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: After privatisation, nuclear power station operators will continue to be required to make appropriate financial provision for decommissioning and other long-term liabilities.

Mr. Garrett: Given the recent report on the very high cost of maintaining safety at Bradwell for the next four years, the likely costs of maintaining safety and maintenance at the other 10 Magnox stations and decommissioning costs of £250 million to £300 million each, who will be expected to pay for the deteriorating safety standards and decommissioning? As those stations are likely to have to be encased in concrete for 100 years, should not the Department make a statement on this issue as soon as possible?

Mr. Spicer: First, I deny that there is any question of deteriorating safety standards. The British nuclear industry has had a tremendous track record for safety, and we mean to keep it that way.

Secondly, all forms of energy safety have costs in terms of protection of the environment. Noisy and obtrusive windmills, potential radiological hazards from nuclear power, sulphur emissions from coal, which we have been discussing, or, indeed, disruption to bird life from estuarial barrages involve costs in protecting the environment. In that sense, there is nothing special about the nuclear industry. I repeat that, with privatisation, proper provision will be made for those costs in the accounts.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The Minister will be aware that the advisory committee on the safety of nuclear installations has recommended that there should be a 50 per cent. increase in the number of Nuclear Installations Inspectorate personnel working on decommissioning. Will he tell the House how many are currently working on decommissioning and whether he will accept the advice to increase the numbers?

Mr. Spicer: I cannot give the precise number of those within the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate who are working on decommissioning, but I shall write to the hon. Gentleman if that figure is available. However, we are up to the complement of 120 inspectors, the target that we had set for 1 April, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will ensure that there is an adequate number of inspectors for the future requirements of the NII.

Electricity Prices

16. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what further representations he has received about the rise in electricity prices.

Mr. Parkinson: I have received a number of representations about electricity price rises.

Ms. Quin: What is the Minister's reaction to the report that was published last week by National Utility Services, which shows that the United Kingdom is well on the way to becoming one of the countries with the most expensive electricity because of the targets that have been imposed on the industry by the Government? What initiatives does he intend to take to help those at the lower end of the income scale who are faced with electricity price rises?

Mr. Parkinson: As I told the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), that company draws its statistics from a very narrow range of its own customers. It does not pretend to cover the whole industry. The CBI and the Electricity Council produce the most authoritative figures. They show that Britain is firmly in the middle of the list, for both industrial and domestic prices. The price increase this year is the first since 1985. Under the Labour Government prices increased ahead of the rate of inflation by more than 30 per cent. Under this Government they are 12 per cent. less than the rate of inflation, even after taking the present price increase into account.

Mr. Watts: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best prospects for low-price electricity will come from his proposal to introduce competition into the generation of electricity and also from giving to the generating companies the right to buy their fuel, including coal, at competitive market prices?

Mr. Parkinson: Yes. Generation costs cover 80 per cent. of the cost of electricity. Competition in that area of the industry offers the best prospect of keen prices for the customer.

Ms. Gordon: Is the Minister aware that because of the increasing cost of electricity a growing number of poorer people are late in making their payments? In London they are receiving very aggressive and unpleasant letters from the electricity authorities, threatening them with court orders allowing the authorities to break into people's homes and install electricity meters if those poorer people are not prepared to sign a statement to the effect that they are willing voluntarily to have meters. A number of these letters have been received by people who are in hospital —often elderly people—and they have caused great distress. Will the Minister do something about it?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Lady knows that under the code of conduct the electricity authorities do not disconnect elderly people during the winter months. I should like her to tell her constituents that the electricity authorities are ready to listen to representations on behalf of consumers who have a real problem and who need help in the staging of the payment of their bills. I hope that the hon. Lady will agree that people should pay their electricity bills, just as they pay other bills. If they do not do so, the price of electricity for everyone will have to be increased.

Electricity Generation

17. Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met with the electricity area board chairmen; and whether new electricity generation developments were discussed.

Mr. Parkinson: I have meetings from time to time with the area board chairmen, at which we discuss a number of issues of common interest.

Miss Widdecombe: In the course of those discussions, how supportive is my right hon. Friend of the idea of emphasis being placed on the future of renewable sources of energy?

Mr. Parkinson: We have a substantial programme of support for investigations into various sources of renewable energy. We are supporting about 218 individual programmes into sources of renewable energy, but most of the area board chairmen and other members of the industry recognise that the main source of electricity will be coal, atomic, gas and oil and that, although renewables will be a valuable peripheral supply, the prospect at present is that they will be a peripheral supply only.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has fast breeder reactor electricity generation been discussed? Will the Secretary of State place on record the fact that the fast breeder reactor programme has been, and continues to be, a useful and effective programme?

Mr. Parkinson: There is no question but that the fast breeder reactor offers a useful future source of energy. One of the problems is that, commercially, we are not likely to develop the technology for another 30 years. The debate is not whether we abandon the technology, but how we preserve it until we need it. I am pleased to confirm that we regard the fast breeder reactor as a potential source of electricity.

Electricity Industry (Regulatory Authority)

21. Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress he has made in considering the setting up of the regulatory authority for the electricity supply industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: All aspects of the regulatory regime are being actively considered with our advisers. We have also had helpful discussions with the electricity supply industry and other interested bodies. I am pleased to say that we are making good progress.

Mr. Moss: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Will he endorse the conclusions of a recent study of energy utilities in the United States, which showed that the companies with the best credit rating and whose bonds were most popular on the market incorporated energy-efficiency responsibilities into their regulatory framework?

Mr. Parkinson: As my hon. Friend said, we intend that the regulators should be responsible for the promotion of the advantages of energy efficiency. We are not prepared to go as far as some critics would wish. We do not seek to impose on people the obligation to save electricity in their homes and to impose on companies an obligation to make energy-saving arrangements. We are in the business, as will be the regulator, of encouraging the efficient use of energy.

THE ARTS

National History Museum

39. Miss Lestor: To ask the Minister for the Arts what have been the administrative costs of admission charges at the Natural History museum in 1987-88.

41. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Minister for the Arts what was the level of admission to the Natural History museum in 1987-88.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): The administration and monitoring of admission charges at the Natural History museum are matters for the museum's trustees. On 9 April the trustees announced that the number of visitors to the public galleries, including the geological and zoological museums, during 1987-88 was 1,633,000, and that the net receipts from admission charges were £1,352,000.

Miss Lestor: Does the Minister put in the debit or credit column the amount being charged to the 50 Third world countries which use the Natural History museum for research into a variety of matters, such as mosquitoes, blood worms and various parasitic diseases? As the Overseas Development Administration uses that museum for research, will he say what discussions he has had with his hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development about the effect that that will have on the ODA's budget?

Mr. Luce: There are a number of sectors in which it is sensible for the Natural History museum to collaborate on research projects with people in other countries. It is for the trustees to decide what priority should be given to projects, but it is only reasonable that the essential costs of that service should be covered.

Mr. Boyes: Do not the figures that the Minister has given hide the fact that attendances at the Natural History museum are at least 40 per cent. down? Does that not mean that many people who get much pleasure and education from visiting the museum are, because of charges, being denied access to it? As the figures show that the numbers of visitors are dropping, will that not inevitably lead to redundancies and low morale among the staff? Should not the Minister withdraw these charges immediately?

Mr. Luce: The trustees must decide whether to accept voluntary donations or make admission charges. It is absolutely right that they should decide whether to introduce charges. The Natural History museum introduced charges just over a year ago. It has increased its overall resources by £1,300,000 and announced that it will improve its facilities as a result. The public, therefore, will get a better service. We find that although in the initial stages of the introduction of admission charges there is a drop in attendances, it does pick up. Attendances at the National Maritime museum increased by 16 per cent. last year compared with the previous year. That museum has introduced admission charges. It is only right that we should leave such decisions to the museums. And they should use that money to increase overall services and facilities for the public.

Mr. Jessel: Have the Government upheld their grant to the Natural History museum, regardless of any charges?

Mr. Luce: I can confirm that without any shadow of doubt. The amount given to the Natural History museum has gone up in real terms by 37 per cent. during the past nine years. Moreover, it has had its funding earmarked for the next three years so that it knows what money it will have. In no way has punitive action been taken on account of the introduction of charges.

Mr. Harris: Can my right hon. Friend explain why museums and galleries are sacrosanct? Why should trustees not be able to raise extra revenue to supplement Government grants if that is what they want, just as their counterparts do in practically every other country?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right. As he says, it is for the trustees to decide. Western and Communist countries have museum charges in addition to basic Government funding. The choice should be open to museums and galleries. If they make charges, however, what matters is that they show the public how facilities will be improved to their benefit.

Mr. Fisher: Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that the figures that he gave the House should be compared with the 3·3 million admissions the year before? Is he aware that his figures show a drop of 40 per cent. on the previous year? The trustees have not been anxious to introduce charges, but they have been forced to do so because the Government are under-funding and neglecting their service. That neglect is documented in the National Audit Office report, which shows under-funding in conservation, research, display, cataloguing, building maintenance and the rest. Is it not time that the Minister faced the time bomb ticking away under our national museums, recognised his responsibilities, and funded museums and galleries properly?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is talking nonsense. He is fishing around for a crisis when there is none. He says that funding has been diminished, but since 1979 it has increased by 26·5 per cent. in real terms. That is not a crisis. Funding has increased. Moreover, in the next three years we shall increase funding for museums and galleries by just under 16 per cent., and this year we shall increase by 20 per cent. the money available for building and maintenance. The Government are earmarking £11 million for increased storage. We can be proud of our record.

Museums and Galleries

40. Mr. Key: To ask the Minister for the Arts how much income is generated by public museums and galleries through providing shops and refreshment facilities on their premises.

Mr. Luce: In the present financial year the national museums and galleries that I sponsor expect their income from non-grant sources, including catering and trading, to exceed £20 million. I have taken a number of measures to encourage and facilitate their efforts to increase such income.

I have given the Museums and Galleries Commission a special allocation for the next three years to help non-national museums and galleries improve their performance in this area.

Mr. Key: Can my right hon. Friend assure those galleries and museums that respond to public demand for these services and generate extra income from them that they will not have their grant cut pro rata?

Mr. Luce: I can confirm without any doubt that there will be no reduction whatever; nor will there be any adjustment to grants for any of the national museums and galleries on account of extra income from the private sector.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that any contribution made by shops and cafes is no substitute for proper public funding of museums and galleries? Does he also agree that this generation has an obligation to pass on the nation's heritage in at least as good a condition as we inherited it? Is he satisfied that sufficient money is being provided for storage, maintenance and restoration of the many objects in musums that are in sad need of proper care?

Mr. Luce: My sole interest is to see an overall increase in the resources of museums and galleries. It would be absolute folly to say that if private sector income increases we should reduce the private sector income accordingly. That would not be an incentive to increase the overall resources. That is my objective, and that is what we are doing, to such an extent that today the national museums and galleries raise at least £20 million from private sector resources.

USSR

42. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Minister for the Arts what steps he is taking to encourage cultural exchanges with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Luce: The majority of cultural exchanges with the USSR take place within the framework of the Anglo-Soviet cultural agreement. The memorandum of understanding signed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the time of her visit to Moscow last year has helped to provide a further impetus for such activity. I shall be making an official visit to the Soviet Union next month and shall do what I can to encourage further exchanges.

Mr. Knapman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that such exchanges and visits help the cause of world peace and detente? Can he give any details of likely exchanges over the next few months?

Mr. Luce: There is no doubt that arts and culture help to break down national barriers, because in so many areas culture does not know or understand those barriers—it goes beyond that. Therefore, exchanges between the Soviet Union and this country in the performing arts and heritage should be warmly welcomed. The National Theatre is about to tour the Soviet Union, and arrangements are being made for the exchange of exhibitions between museums in this country and the Soviet Union.

CIVIL SERVICE

Recruitment

66. Mr. Mans: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what new initiatives have been introduced to encourage recruitment to the Civil Service.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): Examples of a number of initiatives aimed at attracting as wide a field of qualified candidates as possible are given in the Civil Service Commissioners' annual report for 1987, which was placed in the Library of the House on 20 April.

Mr. Mans: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. What efforts are being made to recruit people into the Civil Service at a later stage who have already benefited from careers outside the Civil Service? Will he say what experience they can offer if they are recruited into the Civil Service at that age?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising that question. It is important to encourage into the Civil Service people who have experience in other areas. A recent direct entry competition for grade seven in the service has led to the recruitment of a number of people in their late 30s and early 40s. Many of those people have had experience in local government or education, and at least 50 per cent. of them have had experience in commerce and industry. That is something that I welcome.

Dr. Marek: What will be the effect on recruitment to the Civil Service of the recently announced 40 per cent. drop in attendance figures for the Natural History museum?

Mr. Luce: That is a good try. I am now wearing a different hat and it is that of the Civil Service. Recruitment and retention in the Civil Service are broadly satisfactory, but there are areas in which it is difficult to recruit people with specific skills and in specialist areas and, of course, we have a regional problem. It is true that in the south-east, in particular, we have acute recruiting difficulties. As the hon. Gentleman knows, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is seeking to contain that by the introduction of more flexible pay and allowances for the London area.

Management Improvement

67. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what proposals for reorganisation in his Department he is making following the recommendations of the Efficiency Unit report, "Improving Management in Government: The Next Steps."

Mr. Luce: Like other Ministers, I am reviewing the functions of my Department to see what areas might be appropriate for agency status. I have already identified the Civil Service college and the occupational Health Service as promising candidates for closer examination.

Mr. Thurnham: I welcome that positive lead. May I ask my right hon. Friend to stir his ministerial colleagues to share his sense of urgency in making those much needed reforms?

Mr. Luce: In fairness to some of my colleagues, as my hon. Friend will know, we have already identified 12 possible candidates for the creation of agencies in other Government Departments. Some of my right hon. Friends are looking urgently at the practical implications of that, and I hope to have something further to say before the summer is over.

Mr. Winnick: Have any steps been taken to reorganise the post of chief press officer to the Prime Minister and to change the manner in which he goes out of his way to give warnings to the press and the media generally on what they should or should not publish and broadcast? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Ingham is increasingly seen as the Deputy Prime Minister?

Mr. Luce: That is principally a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but there is no shadow of doubt about the outstanding calibre of Mr. Ingham and the job that he does.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the problems of improving management in government is that for some vital skills industry can pay far higher salaries than the Government—for example, computer and tax experts? Are the Government urgently considering the fact that, to be efficient, they must be able to compete with private enterprise, or they will not get the best people whom they so urgently need?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend puts a finger on a problem that we face. As he rightly says, there is a disparity in certain specialist skills between what the Government can pay and what can be achieved in the private sector. It is partly for that reason that we are losing a number of people. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has judged it right to introduce more flexible allowances and pay to deal with that problem. Pay additions are now available for certain jobs, and that is one way in which we can help to contain the problem.

Agencies

68. Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what representations he has received from Civil Service or civil servant unions about the proposals for the privatisation and creation of new agencies to assume the work of some sections of Government Departments.

Mr. Luce: I have received two representations about the creation of agencies.

Mr. Allen: Is the Minister aware that he needs to state clearly from the Dispatch Box the exact position that the Government are adopting on agencies in relation to trade unions? On 18 February the Minister's Office issued a central guidance note to managers in Departments. The note said:

"the new arrangements for agencies will not undermine national bargaining on terms and conditions of service including pay"

and

"the unions will be fully consulted on the handling of the proposals."

That contradicts many of the Minister's statements in the House. Which view is correct—the Minister's, or the one issued by his Department?

Mr. Luce: There is a clear commitment that, when final decisions are to be taken on the implementation of certain agency proposals, there will be proper consultation with the unions. Until we have identified which agencies are to have that kind of agreement, we cannot say. The unions will be fully consulted at that stage. As for national bargaining, negotiations on most conditions of service for departmental agencies are conducted centrally, and that will continue.

Ms. Mowlam: What percentage of first division civil servants are women? How has that percentage changed since 1984, when the programme for action was introduced

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be more appropriate to raise that point on the next question.

First Division Staff

69. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many first division grade civil servants have had industrial or commercial experience.

Mr. Luce: This information is not held centrally. The Government place great value in attracting to the Civil Service at all levels those with industrial or commercial experience.

Mr. Field: Does my right hon. Friend agree that such commercial and industrial experience is invaluable to the Civil Service? Will he do his utmost to ensure that the Civil Service recruits people with the skills that may not be available to it? May we look forward to the day when a member of the first division is seconded for a short period to industry?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend on the importance of doing that. As I said in answer to an earlier question, following the recent direct entry competition for people who are older than the normal recruitment age, at least 50 per cent. of those recruited came from industry and commerce. The Government want to encourage that.

We have a policy on arranging secondments. The number of Civil Service secondments from and to the private sector has doubled in the past nine years. The number increased substantially last year on the previous year. We have a number of other arrangements—for example, the Whitehall and industry scheme, under which civil servants go for short periods to industry—to enable greater contact between the private sector and the Civil Service.

Ms. Mowlam: Let me try again. What percentage of those first division grade civil servants are women, and how has that percentage changed since 1984 when the programme for action to increase the percentage of women at the high levels in the Civil Service was introduced?

Mr. Luce: There has been an increase, and the report shows that, in the proportion of women in grades up to senior positions, although for the very senior positions —grade 3 and above—the proportion of women is still very low. My concern is to ensure that there is equality of opportunity and that any obstacles to that are ironed out. I am pleased that in the recent promotions to very senior positions, 11 per cent. were women. The hon. Lady may think that that is a low figure, but it is much higher than the proportion in the senior grades.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I welcome the improvement in the representation of women, but has my right hon. Friend any further plans for improving matters?

Mr. Luce: Yes. There is a recommended programme of action and the Government will do their best to implement it. It is noticeable that there is now more scope for part-time jobs in the Civil Service, and a large proportion of women are taking up those opportunities. There is also scope for job sharing in the service, and a large number of women are taking up that opportunity, too. I shall ensure with my colleagues in other Departments that the programme of action is implemented as well as possible.

Prime Minister's Office

70. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what action he is taking on issues not covered by his reply to the Adjournment debate on Friday 22 April on the conduct of the Prime Minister's Private Office.

Mr. Luce: None, Sir.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the Minister recollect that in the Adjournment debate that he courteously answered I referred in detail to the statement by Sir Frank Cooper, former permanent secretary at the Ministry of Defence, that Mr. Bernard Ingham ought not to be a civil servant, given the role that he performs? May we refer back to the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and ask seriously whether those who talk in the terms in which Mr. Ingham did over the weekend about the hysteria of the press ought to be paid from party rather than taxpayers funds?

Mr. Luce: I noted in that Adjournment debate, and again today, that the hon. Gentleman seeks to dredge up old issues that have already been dealt with and adequately answered. He does that because he knows that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has been an outstanding success and is a Prime Minister of great integrity. It is because of that that the hon. Gentleman seeks to undermine the whole position.

P and O Dispute

3.32 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the latest developments in the seamen's dispute."

It is a specific matter in that P and O's insistence that its package of 400 job cuts, increased working hours, less leave and a cut in pay should be implemented almost immediately has provoked a 14-week strike. It is equally specific and relevant that the National Union of Seamen has repeatedly made clear its willingness to accept the P and O proposals if they are phased in over three years—which is what the company itself originally asked—well in advance of the Channel tunnel. It is also a specific and relevant matter in that the NUS has been willing to accept binding arbitration and has been asking for it for 13 weeks, but P and O has turned it down.

It is an important matter because the safety of the public is at stake. Under P and O's proposals, if the Herald of Free Enterprise were sailing tonight from Zeebrugge, it would have 15 fewer crew than on the night of 6 March last year when it went down. Department of Transport officials have been checking the structural seaworthiness of the ferries, but the dangers involved in having untrained crews, reduced crewing levels and 18-hour shifts are outside their brief. It is critical for the public, as well as for the seamen, that the safety risks in the proposals, as revealed in the "Brass Tacks" television programme, are fully known and publicly scrutinised.

The matter is urgent because the possibilities of resolving the dispute by negotiation are coming to a head. Whether or not the current Sealink plan proves acceptable, there is now a real risk that the primary dispute with P and O at Dover may harden to the point where compromise becomes difficult, if not impossible.

The NUS has shown itself willing to compromise. The dispute could be resolved by further negotiations between the two sides. I submit that it is vital that all public pressure be brought to bear now to ensure that any intransigence on the part of P and O is not allowed to stand in the way of the wider public interest.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I earnestly seek your support for a full and early debate on this matter of crucial public concern.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the latest developments in the seamen's dispute."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said. As he knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 20 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the orders set down for today or tomorrow and also to consider the critieria laid down in the Standing Orders. I regret that under those criteria I cannot submit the hon. Member's application to the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: No, there is another application under Standing Order No. 20 from Mr. Dave Nellist.

GEC Plessey Telecommunications Limited

3.35 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement at 11 am on Friday 6 May of 1,800 redundancies by GEC and Plessey through the new telecommunications company GPT."

Of those 1,800 redundancies, 40 per cent. are due to take place in Coventry, 40 per cent. in Kirkcaldy and the rest in the constituencies of my hon. Friends the Members for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) and for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields). The Spon street plant in Coventry is destined for virtual closure. This will affect not only hundreds of my constituents, but also those of my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes).

My constituents are bitter and upset. Many have given their lives to GEC. The GEC-Plessey merger of October last year, with the rationalisation and streamlining taking place now, is simply about profit—about increasing dividends to shareholders, while 800 of my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry North-East have to pay the price of being thrown on to the scrap heap. Hundreds more people in our city could be affected.

GEC is not a poor company. It is not for financial reasons that all these redundancies and closures have been announced. The company has hundreds of millions of pounds in liquid assets at the bank. In a letter to me the company speaks of senior management spending many months since the plans were first announced in order to endorse

"plans consistent with the objectives and needs of the merged Company."

It says that there will be retraining and hope for redundant people finding other employment.

If there is really a cash flow problem, perhaps the Butcher of Bowden—Lord Weinstock—could sell a couple of racehorses. He spends half a million pounds a time buying them. There will not just be 800 redundancies. There will be several hundred more in ancillary sub-contractors, service companies, shops, and so on. Above and beyond that, in the city of Coventry, where already only 14 or 15 per cent. of school leavers get real jobs when they leave school, a further thousand school leavers will have no jobs to go to.

GPT is the biggest telecommunications firm in Britain and the tenth biggest in the world. If the limit of its social responsibility rests on profit margins, it is about time the House redebated the privatisation of British Telecom and the monopoly position of GPT within that supposedly expanding industry, and brought back into extended public ownership these crucial firms in the economy and put them into the hands of the workers instead of profit managers like Weinstock. If workers ran those companies, the horizon of their responsibilities would not be the bottom line of shareholders' dividends, but would be the families of those who have given their lives to GEC and Plessey for the past 34 years in Coventry, Warwickshire, Liverpool, Kirkcaldy, Beeston and Bishop Auckland.

I urge you to grant this debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement by GEC Plessey of 1,800 redundancies in the telecommunications firm GPT."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I must repeat what I said to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I regret that the matter that he has raised does not meet the criteria laid down under Standing Order No. 20. I hope that he will find other opportunities to bring the matter before the House.

Points of Order

3.39 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you clear up some confusion that arose during business questions last Thursday? At columns 1021 and 1024 points of order were raised by the hon. Members for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder), and you allowed them to be heard. At the end of business questions, and after an application under Standing Order No. 20, at column 1031 I suggested that you had adopted a practice different from the one previously followed in your rulings on when points of order can be made during Question Time. I was supported in that by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook).

In reply, Mr. Speaker, you said:

"I dealt with those points of order because they appeared to require my immediate intervention. If the hon. Gentleman had risen at that time, he would certainly have been heard in the same way. There is no change at all. In our debates, the points of order raised are dealt with immediately."—[Official Report, 5 May 1988; Vol. 132, C. 1031-32.]

I accept that that is true for debates, but that was not the case at Question Time, and had not been the case until that point.

I refer you, Mr. Speaker—I have supplied your office with the references in the Official Report—to an incident that took place in the House on 19 November 1986. At column 548, the Secretary of State for the Environment implied that I had stolen some articles of silver that had belonged to the Greater London council. I shall not go into the issue again, but I say simply that I had taken them into protective custody. When I tried to rise on a point of order, you said:

"Order. We shall deal with this later."

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) also tried to raise a point of order, and at column 549 you said:

"Order. No, I cannot take points of order in the middle of questions. I shall take them at the end of Question Time."—[Official Report, 19 November 1986; Vol. 105, c. 549].

It is clear that what happened last Thursday was a variation on a rule that we have come to accept. Indeed, it has been accepted by the House because it makes for good order. It is pointless people making points of order during Question Time when they should make them at the end of Question Time.

Will you consider, Mr. Speaker, making a statement on the matter so that we are all absolutely clear? If you reaffirm the rule that points of order arising from statements made or incidents during Question Time should not be made until after Question Time, will you consider doing what you did for me on the previous occasion, which was to get the Official Report to insert the point of order that was made after Question Time at the point where it was originally raised? The matter is slightly confusing, but if you made a ruling, it would assist us all.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in giving me some knowledge of what he was going to say——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): He is a gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: He is, indeed.

I adhere to what I said last Thursday. I shall hear points of order during questions only if they concern matters that require my immediate intervention, such as the use of a grossly disorderly expression. I do not propose—I think that the hon. Gentleman will understand this—to reopen today what occurred on 19 November 1986. I have looked again at the interventions and points of order during business questions last Thursday, and I agree that they should have been taken, not when they were, but immediately before the business of the day.

P and O Dispute

3.43 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This morning my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and I visited the picket line at the P and O dispute at Dover. Although I do not wish to challenge your response to the application made my my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) under Standing Order No. 20, may I say that several people involved in the dispute drew to our attention serious unsafe working practices on the P and O vessels that are attempting to sail and the mad and desperate search by P and O to find people to scab in the dispute?

Many of the people on the picket line asked us how safety could be debated in the House and by what means Parliament can express its view on the dispute. They looked to us, as we look to you, Mr. Speaker, to find some means by which the serious matters of safety at sea, the appalling treatment of those who are in dispute with P and O and the mad drive for profits by that company can be brought to public attention through the House.

Mr. Speaker: This is a serious matter. There are plenty of opportunities to raise the matter; for instance, on Opposition days, in Adjournment debates and at Question Time.

Social Security Reform

3.45 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, one of our responsibilities is to try to ventilate the concern of our constituents. You are no doubt aware as, first and foremost, a right hon. Member of this House, that many elderly people simply do not know whether the housing benefit increases are to be paid and, if so, from what date, and when they will be compensated. There is total chaos and confusion on the ground, which is causing tremendous hardship, worry and anxiety.

I know that you are not responsible for a statement being made. No statement has been made by the Secretary of State for Social Services since he first made his statement on the Government's climbdown. You may well say that tomorrow is the day for social services questions. I have looked at the Order Paper and believe that I am right in saying that only two questions on this matter are likely to be reached.

It is wrong that we should be denied the opportunity to express on the Floor of the House of Commons the worries of so many people in this country. Literally hundreds of thousands of those people could well be faced with substantial increases. They do not know whether they will have to pay, whether they have the means to do so and when they will receive compensation.

The other point——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We had a debate on this about 10 days ago and, as the hon. Gentleman correctly said, there are social services questions tomorrow. I have not yet looked carefully at them, but, if the hon. Gentleman says that there are only two on this matter that are likely to be reached, no doubt he is right. I am sure that, as this is a major matter, those on the Front Bench responsible for the organisation of business will have heard what the hon. Gentleman has said, but it is not a matter of order for me.

Abortion (Amendment) Bill

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Following the conclusion of the debate on the Abortion (Amendment) Bill on 6 May, you may have seen a number of press reports and television interviews in which it was suggested that there had been a parliamentary mugging, foul play and, according to one broadcast, cheating.

I should be grateful if you would confirm that on 6 May the Standing Orders were fully and properly followed in Parliament, that the rules of debate were properly followed, that the treatment of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) appeared to many of us very generous, in that closures were granted within an almost unprecedentedly short time and that, in all, there was a perfectly fair and proper debate on a number of amendments throughout the morning. There was no parliamentary mugging, no foul play and certainly no cheating on that day.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot be held responsible for the extravagant adjectives that have been used elsewhere, but I confirm what the hon. Gentleman has said. To my knowledge, the debate proceeded in good order and under our usual procedures.

Standing Order No. 20 Debates

3.47 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The other day my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) asked for a debate, under Standing Order No. 20, on the seaman's dispute, and he was turned down. Today, my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) asked for a debate under Standing Order No. 20, and he was also turned down.

For many years I have noticed that Back Benchers have sometimes been granted debates under Standing Order No. 20—or, as it used to be Standing Orders Nos. 9 and 10—and that Front-Bench spokesmen, who have then made an application, have usually been turned down.

This is a matter of great importance. Over the years we have had many debates on issues affecting seamen and on trade union strikes. How on earth can any hon. Member obtain a debate under Standing Order No. 20? In my 24 years here I have known Speakers of all sorts—and sizes—grant Standing Order No. 20 applications from Back Benchers on precisely such issues as this. I should like to know how a Back Bencher or an occupant of the Opposition Front Bench can obtain a Standing Order No. 20 debate on a matter of this importance. Are we reaching a stage when it will not be possible to discuss such issues unless they fall in Government time or Front-Bench time generally? Such a situation would represent a serious departure from the rights of Members of this place as we now understand them.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster) rose——

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do the hon. Members for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) and for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) wish to raise points of order on the same issue? If so, I shall respond to them in one reply.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Further to the previous two points of order, Mr. Speaker. Admittedly you are not responsible for this, but as extra time was given in 1967 to what I shall call the Steel Abortion Bill, can you not understand——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a different matter.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to raise a point of order on the NUS dispute?

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: My point of order relates to the rights that attach to debates in this place and points of order that are being raised in the Chamber. Many of us have not heard such disingenuous nonsense. There are calls for a debate on the dispute affecting the National Union of Seamen. We heard these calls last week and we have heard them again today. The Opposition, quite rightly in a democracy, are able to initiate half-day debates, a one-hour debate or a three-hour debate. Why should the time of the House be taken up when it has other important debates before it, when it is clear that if the Opposition feel so strongly about the mad idiots in the NUS who want to destroy seamen's jobs, they could have a debate on them? Why should we be kept here listening to this disingenuous rubbish?

Mr. Speaker: I can answer both the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and the hon. Member for Selly Oak by saying that it is an extremely onerous responsibility of Mr. Speaker to decide whether to grant an emergency debate that will take precedence over the orders that are set down for this day or the next day. The Chair must take into account all the criteria that are set out clearly in Standing Order No. 20, to which I draw the attention of hon. Members. One of the criteria, as the hon. Member for Walton well knows, is the other opportunities to raise issues before the House, and these have been mentioned by the hon. Member for Selly Oak.

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

(Clauses Nos. 22, 23, 26 to 28, 31, 42, 49, 91, 98, 127 and 128 and Schedule No. 7). [Progress 3rd May.]

Considered in Committee.

[Mr. Harold Walker *in the Chair.]

Ordered,

That the order in which proceedings in Committee of the whole House on the Finance (No. 2) Bill are to be taken shall be Clause 22, Clause 23, Clause 27, Clause 28, Clause 49, clause 31, Clause 98, Clause 26, Clause 127, Clause 91, Schedule 7, Clause 128, Clause 42.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

3.53 pm

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): The Committee will note that amendments to clause 42 appear on the first page of the Amendment Paper. However, the Committee resolved last Tuesday to consider clause 42 at the end of its proceedings. The first clause to be taken today is clause 49.

PRIVATE RENTED HOUSING

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 49, line 15, after 'tenancies', insert

'let at or below a reasonable rent as determined by a rent assessment committee under the Housing Act 1988'.

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget statement that he would expand the business expansion scheme to cover properties to let in the private rented sector, there were immediate cries of "Rachmanism". It was claimed that such an expansion would bring back the worst of the Rachman era. Those cries are understandable for anyone who remembers the evils of that period, which became, in the words of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the unacceptable face of capitalism.

The Committee must ask whether there are ways of attracting private capital into housing that will not bring back Rachmanism. My right hon. and hon. Friends do not think it right to dismiss out of hand the use of the business expansion scheme as a possible approach. In view of the housing crisis, those who appear to take that approach and who represent other Opposition parties do a disservice to the people.

I believe that by the means that they have chosen the Government will open the door to the worst sort of private landlord. Instead, they should use a carefully tailored device to attract private capital back into rented housing, but ensure that that is done in a way that will provide adequate security and rent protection to tenants. Given the scale of the housing crisis, it would be irresponsible to say that there is no place for private capital and that we should not be attempting to attract it back into housing.

It is clear that the public authorities alone have not been able to solve some of our most serious housing problems. Even if they were not subjected to the unnecessary restrictions to which the Government have subjected them, they would still not be able to solve those problems.

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

Much more could be achieved if the Government were not preventing housing authorities from spending the capital receipts that they have obtained from selling houses on more investment in housing. The Government are clearly placing many unnecessary and inappropriate restrictions on the ability of local authorities to play their part in tackling housing problems. The Government are also tightening the reins on the voluntary housing sector in many ways.

With the present serious crisis we cannot exclude the role of private capital in housing. If we were to do so, we would perpetuate the monopolistic aspects of rented housing that are among the worst features of the problem. I have experienced that problem in all its different forms during my years as a Member of Parliament. I have experienced the dangerous consequences of a private monopoly on rented housing where people are afraid to reveal their political allegiances for fear that they will not get a cottage from the big landowner. I have seen exactly the same thing in its municipalised form where people fear that if they have said anything rude to any member of the family of the housing officer, they will not be considered for a council house.

The same kind of feudal deference arises in the municipal rented sector as has arisen over the years in the private rented sector. Any kind of monopoly of rented housing tends to be extremely dangerous for rights of choice or a sense of independence.

Many groups of people who want or need rented housing are not getting it. One obvious group includes people who have to move in search of work. The previous lack of privately rented accommodation in many areas is a serious impediment to those looking for work elsewhere who find that the public housing sector cannot help them.

Many people looking for jobs in different parts of the country have found that they cannot obtain housing when they apply for those jobs. The national mobility scheme does not provide those people with sufficient access to council housing in the area to which they want to move. I am thinking particularly of people who move from areas like mine in the north-east to the south-east of England. They cannot afford to enter the private housing market in the south-east because prices are so high. They cannot get council houses in the south-east where there are relatively few council houses as the rate of council house sales has been so high. There are very few privately rented houses available and that is a strong argument for ensuring that more are provided.

The Committee should consider whether we can tailor the business expansion scheme incentive to ensure that it provides adequate protection for tenants. The fear is that the people most likely to use the scheme will be those who regard it as a get-rich-quick opportunity, and will take advantage of the changes in tenants' protection to exploit tenants in near monopolistic situations.

The Government appear to have removed many of the aspects of tenants' security and protection on rents on the argument that that was the only way to get private capital back into housing. Is the business expansion scheme really necessary on top of what the Government have done already? They have greatly weakened the tenant's position by arguing that if they did not do so there would not be many houses to rent and therefore tenants in general would suffer.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I want to ask the hon. Gentleman a question in the most comradely terms about a statement that was made in the middle of the previous election campaign which suggested that a policy should be pursued whereby people who let a room in their home would not pay tax on the income that they derived. Will the hon. Gentleman develop that concept so that we may hear the argument explained more fully?

Mr. Beith: That suggestion was an extremely good idea. It was an attempt to unlock the large amount of accommodation that could be available in the short term to deal with the housing problem for single people. Several disincentives have been suggested as reasons preventing people from offering such accommodation. It was suggested that people might be unable to remove an unsatisfactory tenant or regain the use of a room when the family required it. It was also suggested that there was not a great financial incentive to provide that accommodation.

That incentive could have been increased by the scheme that we put forward. It combined a degree of financial incentive with a system of administration designed to relieve the landlord—who might in many cases be a widow living alone in a house of three or four bedrooms—of the problems and complications of tenancy protection. It was a sensible scheme, but I cannot address it in connection with the amendment, which does not bear directly upon that scheme.

Nevertheless, that scheme was another attempt to acknowledge the fact that we have housing and property that could be put to better use and that private capital is available which could be used to expand the provision of rented housing.

I am worried, as are others who are critical of the Chancellor's proposals, about what will be the position of tenants if the business expansion scheme is used without giving them any protection. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure at least that rents are set at reasonable levels. It is no longer possible to tie the business expansion scheme proposals to fair rents, because the Government have abolished that provision. Fair rents are on their way out. There will remain only rent assessment committees, which are normally used not for the assured tenancies with which we are dealing but for shorthold tenancies. Indeed, access to rent assessment committees in respect of assured tenancies is very limited and is available primarily to the landlord. That is a fairly weak limitation.

If a business expansion scheme tenancy conferred upon the tenant the right of access to a rent assessment committee, that would provide some means of ensuring that the tenant was not exploited. That would be particularly when the landlord—perhaps a company—had a monopoly or near-monopoly of rented property in the area. It would at least limit the ability of the business expansion scheme to create exploitable tenancies and the ability of landlords to push up rents in an area.

A company that wanted to make a lot of money fast out of the business expansion scheme could move into an area where there was a shortage of rented accommodation and buy a number of properties. It could then push up the rents in that area. It would have the benefit of the business expansion scheme in financing that operation in the first place and could then, by use of its monopoly, push up rents to an exploitative level.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I wonder whether the example that the hon. Gentleman has given is correct. If a company tried to do what he said by acquiring existing properties which were tenanted, the people occupying those properties could continue as fair tenants and there would be no advantage to the company. If the company were to purchase instead vacant or newly developed properties, in either case there would be a net introduction of new accommodation for rent that would not otherwise be available. How could a net new supply force up rental levels?

Mr. Beith: It could do so if the net new supply fell far below the level of demand. Provided that supply was less than demand, the company could force up prices. Indeed, no market price can be calculated if there is no rented property available. I could take the hon. Gentleman to various parts of London and elsewhere in the country where virtually no rented property is available. If he were able to obtain in such an area two or three properties—which had, perhaps, been in single occupation—and turn them into tenanted properties, he would have a virtual monopoly of rented housing and could set what rents he chose.

The situation is further distorted by the complications of housing benefit. There is not a free market in rented housing. I have submitted another amendment which, although it cannot be debated now, the Minister might like to keep at the back of his mind. It is designed to probe why it was necessary to apply the higher rate of tax relief to the business expansion scheme. A landlord who takes advantage of the scheme without the protection that I am suggesting will be investing in property with a potential for capital appreciation that is greater than almost anything else into which he could put his money. Why should he need such a large incentive? With existing schemes, no more that 50 per cent. of net assets may be represented by property. It is already recognised within the business expansion scheme that it is not the purpose of the scheme to finance property ownership and that there is not the degree of risk in property ownership to justify the conferring of substantial incentives.

The Government are offering large incentives to draw people into projects in which they can make a great deal of money without being offered a big incentive, and in which they will find it easier to participate if tenants are not given a measure of protection. The Minister may feel that my amendment to make use of rent assessment committees is not the best way of maximising tenants protection. However, unless he is able to offer some guarantee that tenants will not be exploited under the scheme, he will do the cause of expanding privately rented housing no good.

If the business expansion scheme is used in that way it will get a very bad name after the first two or three landlords are found engaging in the kind of activity I have described. Considerable harm will be done, when we should be looking in every possible direction for means of tackling an appalling housing problem. It is a problem which creates social injustice, reduces people's economic opportunities, and prices people out of a free society—if they cannot obtain access to housing in areas where there is work available to them.

If the Minister wishes to win our support for the business expansion scheme in the private rental market, he must do something to afford protection to tenants. Otherwise, the scheme will be too easy to abuse. Unless the Minister can offer such protection, either by accepting my amendment or by an alternative, he cannot expect our support for the clause.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): I hope that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will forgive me if I reply briefly to his remarks, because some of the wider issues on which he touched might be more conveniently discussed in the clause stand part debate. The hon. Gentleman may agree that he went wider than the narrow terms of his amendment. None the less, I am grateful to him for the moderate way in which he proposed his amendment and did not express total hostility to the idea of the business expansion scheme being used to provide more privately rented property. Indeed, he went further and indicated that he felt there was a shortage of such accommodation, which was a great impediment to mobility in locking people into areas of high unemployment. That is one of the major reasons why we want to see a revival in the privately rented sector.

The hon. Gentleman was essentially trying to strike a different balance between the landlord and tenant than that being struck by the Housing Bill and by the concept of the new assured tenancies. I do not want to open up the whole Housing Bill debate this afternoon, but the tax relief in question is built upon the assumption that the Bill will be enacted. The proposals that we have put before the House try to strike a balance between the landlord and tenant that we believe is reasonable. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that there have been many attempts by previous Conservative and even by Labour Governments—for example, by the late Richard Crossman—to alter that balance within an adminisrative framework and to try to achieve a greater, albeit regulated, supply of private rented accommodation. Those previous attempts all came to grief because they did not move far enough towards allowing genuine market rents to be charged in the private sector.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it not at the core of this debate that a previous Conservative Government set out to deregulate the housing market under the Rent Act 1957? All new rented dwellings were deregulated with the promise, at the time when that Bill was going through the House of Commons, that that would lead to a substantial increase in rented accommodation. However, the opposite occurred. The Minister mentioned the late Richard Crossman, but he was responsible, as Minister for Housing, for repealing the 1957 Act, which was so discredited that the then Conservative Opposition did not even vote against his doing so.

Mr. Lamont: I do not think that in the first part of his observation the hon. Gentleman was really disagreeing with what I was saying. I was saying that Conservative Governments in the 1950s did not go far enough and that what they did did not have the intended effect.

Although it is largely my fault that we are doing so, I do not think that it serves our purpose this afternoon to go too far back into the policies of Henry Brooke, or indeed the late Richard Crossman. I merely say to the hon.

[Mr. Lamont]

Gentleman that I do not think that past Governments, Labour or Conservative, went far enough in giving freedom to landlords to charge a market rent.

The new assured tenancy scheme will allow a tenant and landlord to agree any rent that they choose. We believe that that is right, because the best way to arrive at a reasonable rent is to allow it to be determined by competition and market forces. In the past we have seen, all too clearly, attempts to restrict rents causing properties to leave the private sector or not to appear in it, so that people who wanted to rent and were willing to pay a market rent found that no property was available. Indeed, there has been almost no worthwhile investment in private rented property for 50 years, and the sector is declining considerably.

The clause extends the business expansion scheme to investment in companies that let residential property on the new assured tenancy basis. We consider this necessary in the early years of deregulation, to speed up the process of bringing more rented property on to the market. It would be counter-productive and foolish to restrict the rents that could be charged by the BES company. The likely outcome would not be that the benefits of the tax relief would be passed on to the tenant in the form of lower rent. It would simply discourage the supply, and discourage landlords from making more rented property available. Again, we would find willing landlords and willing tenants being frustrated by Government restrictions.

It is doubtful whether the amendment would have any effect. Under the Housing Bill, a rent assessment committee determines the rent when the landlord proposes an increase under a periodic tenancy and the tenant chooses to refer it to the committee. The committee, however, has no role in connection with the initial rent that is charged, and no role in fixing the rent when the mechanism for increasing it is built into the tenancy agreement.

Furthermore, the Housing Bill does not use the term "reasonable rent", which the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has incorporated in the amendment. What the Housing Bill does is to provide for the committee to determine a rent at which the property might reasonably be expected to be let on the open market by a willing landlord: in other words, the market rent. We believe, however, that imposing a rent assessment committee's view of what would be a market rent on all tenancies from the outset, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, so that a higher rent could not be charged even if the landlord and tenant were in agreement, would not be right. It would create uncertainty, and would discourage landlords from providing property for letting.

I am afraid that, despite the moderate way in which the hon. Gentleman proposed his amendment, I do not think that I can accept it. I hope to deal on clause stand part with some of the wider issues that he raised.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): The tragedy is that, good as the intentions of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) are in relation to fair rents, no tenant would save money, no rent would be reduced and no family would be better off as a result of the amendment. The reason is that he has totally misunderstood what rent assessment committees are there to do, under the Housing Bill. They will not set the initial rents. They will determine rents only on appeal, and, as the Minister has conceded, they will have no remit in regard to fair rents.

One strong objection to the business expansion scheme is that we are not in a position to force fair rents, but we have a number of other objections. We believe that the major problem of the scheme is that money that ought to be used to provide better housing under housing associations and local authorities will be frittered away in tax reliefs. For those reasons—which we want to debate this afternoon—I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment, which will have no force whatever, and allow us to get on with the major debate on the business expansion scheme.

4.15 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I understand that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is making his parliamentary debut in his new role as shadow Chancellor and in addressing the Committee on the Finance Bill. [Interruption.] If I am wrong about the hon. Gentleman's experience, I shall gladly give way and apologise to him.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman may have failed to notice that I have been addressing the House on this subject for about a year.

Mr. Gow: I think that I may be right. I said that this was the hon. Gentleman's debut as shadow Chancellor in addressing a Committee of the Whole House on the Finance Bill. If he has done it before, I can only say that this afternoon was not a triumph. We understand the the hon. Gentleman is not only the shadow Chancellor for the newly formed party, but a possible candidate for the leadership. You may care to reflect, Mr. Walker, on the hon. Gentleman's good fortune in not being surrounded by all his colleagues. Only one has been here to learn the truth, which is that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the Finance Bill and does not understand the Housing Bill, of whose Standing Committee his hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) was a rather undistinguished member. It would have been greatly to the advantage of the shadow Chancellor if he had studied both Bills more carefully. I hope that he will not detain the Committee any longer, and will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Beith: I thought that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) was going to make a speech discussing the issues raised in the amendment. I used to think that he was interested in housing issues; he was, after all, Minister for Housing at one time. He clearly prefers, however, to engage in discussion of wider political matters at a pretty superficial level.

I also thought, when the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) spoke, that I had intruded on a private quarrel which could be conducted only on the basis of being either in favour of private landlords or wholeheartedly opposed to them. Indeed, the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) intervened when they were mentioned, and said that they should go. It is a widespread view in the Labour party that there is no role for the private rented sector.

My purpose in tabling the amendment—and I am strengthened in my view that we should press it—is to suggest that there is a role for private rented housing, and that the Government should be looking for ways to encourage a responsible private rented sector without doing so in ways that afford no protection to tenants. I can hardly be criticised for the unsatisfactory features of the Government's housing legislation—including the rent assessment committees—given the effort put by my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) into criticising those proposals when they were put forward. The amendment offers the Government an opportunity to find a way of moderating their own proposals.

Let us suppose for a moment that the Government are right in their assumption that the change in the balance between landlord and tenant will attract more people into private sector housing. That must have been their intention. The argument that they used throughout all the debates on the housing legislation was that the balance was wrong, and that shifting it would bring more capital into private housing.

If there were anything in that argument, the business expansion scheme would be of only limited relevance to the expansion of the private rented sector. As it accords considerably greater benefits to landlords who will already have been released from their former obligations, which the Government believe kept some of them out of the housing market altogether, why should not a greater obligation towards tenants be imposed on that group of landlords—particularly as it may prevent the scheme from being abused, and becoming a means of returning to the days of Rachmanism?

We have put forward a reasonable proposal, and have offered the Government an opportunity to suggest alternatives. But they seem determined to drive ahead with an unrestrained incentive to landlords, with no tenant protection at all. The Labour party seems determined not even to consider ways in which the private sector could play a larger role in tackling the enormous housing problems. In those circumstances, I feel that we are entitled to differ, and to say that there is a role for a responsible private sector. I therefore intend to press my amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question according negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This clause, together with schedule 4, extends the business expansion scheme to investment in companies which let residential property on the new assured tenancy terms. It complements the current Housing Bills, which introduce this kind of tenancy. The aim is to encourage the provision of private rented accommodation. The shortage of such accommodation in many areas in our cities has been one of the main causes of homelessness, and it has also been an obstacle to labour mobility.

In the longer term, the freedom for landlords to charge market rents under the new-style assured tenancies will stimulate more investment in private rented housing, but we see a strong case for speeding up this progress by providing a special incentive in the early years of deregulation. Therefore, we propose to extend the business expansion scheme to investment in companies letting properties on the new assured tenancy terms, which give tenants security of tenure. This relief will be available for only five years. The Bill provides for BES relief to be available for shares issued after Royal Assent and before the end of 1993.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister assure the Committee that companies formed under the business expansion scheme to provide private rented accommodation will have to subscribe to a social landlords' charter that has been proposed by the Minister for Housing and Planning?

Mr. Lamont: No. The terms of the assured tenancies under which investment can take place under the legislation are precisely the same as those in the Housing Bill. Any proposal that is made by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning would be incorporated and would have to be observed by any company which was benefiting from the business expansion scheme. I shall return to that question in order to confirm or amend my answer.

Relief will apply to shares that are issued after Royal Assent to the Finance Bill and before the end of 1993. The new assured tenancy basis will not be available immediately. We expect it to come into force early next year. In the interim, a company will be able to use the business expansion scheme to raise money to buy or build properties, but it will be unable to let them. Nevertheless, we felt that it was right to make BES relief available during the interim period, because the purchase of properties and any necessary preparations to make them ready for letting could take some time. We want companies using the BES to be able to let properties on assured tenancies as soon as possible.

As the aim of the BES relief is to encourage the continuing provision of rented property, the relief will be available only for assured tenancies that give the tenant long-term security. There will be a limit on the value of each let property. This will prevent tax relief from being used to provide expensive properties for renting. The limit will be £125,000 in Greater London, and £85,000 elsewhere. If the value of the property exceeds this limit, the letting will not qualify. The Bill contains a power to amend these limits by statutory instrument.

Mr. Gordon Brown: What are the mandatory reasons that will allow houses to be repossessed? Does the Minister agree that it may be in the financial interests of a company to attempt to repossess its houses after five years?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is arguing against the whole basis of the Housing Bill. He is saying—and I expect that it will be the major point in the debate—that it provides an incentive to evict people. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning has produced a battery of new safeguards for tenants that will strengthen the criminal law and give the tenant the right to compensation if he is unfairly evicted. There is a risk of eviction from rented property, but that is more likely to arise from controls that make it impossible for landlords to receive a decent return on their property. The Housing Bill provides tenants with security of tenure, backed by changes to the legal protection that is available to them. Moreover, in certain circumstances, there will be access to the rent assessment committees. The legislation strikes a balance between the needs of the landlord and the tenant.

Mr. Brown: Does the Minister agree that intention to redevelop is one of the means by which tenancies can be repossessed on a mandatory basis, and that it may be in the financial interest of a company to repossess the tenancies after five years?

Mr. Lamont: Yes. Under the business expansion scheme the property has to be let on a long-term basis. The hon. Gentleman believes that there will be an incentive for a landlord to get vacant possession or to develop a property with vacant possession, but a company will be unable to qualify for BES relief unless it is letting the property as rented property. The BES relief will bring into existence companies which will let property on a continuing basis and also on an assured tenancy basis.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister able to foresee circumstances in which a person who is a tenant and an investor under a business expansion scheme will be able to rent from his own investment? Is it not possible that he might receive tax relief on an investement from which he had already received a benefit?

Mr. Lamont: That is not possible. If the hon. Gentleman can demonstrate any way in which that is possible we shall take action to stop it, because that is not the purpose of the business expansion scheme.

The Opposition refer to harassment and to incentives to evict, but that is not the purpose of the legislation. We are prepared to look at any reasonable provisions that the Opposition may wish to put to us to safeguard the rights of tenants that do not cut across the Housing Bill, which we believe strikes the right balance between the rights of tenants and the need to give landlords a proper incentive to invest in rented property.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): When we discussed the Housing Bill the Minister accepted that practices of landlords or property developers such as Nicholas Hoogstratel were not covered by the law and that changes in the Bill would make it easier for him to carry on such practices. Although the Minister expressed grave reservations about that landlord's practices, when that landlord came before the courts his case was dismissed. What is there to prevent that person and his companies benefiting from the business expansion scheme and continuing to keep properties in bad condition and charge prices that tenants cannot afford to pay?

Mr. Lamont: I wish to make no comments about one individual. Bad landlords are a product of previous Rent Acts. This legislation, the housing legislation and the BES are intended to provide a continuing supply of property on an assured tenancy basis. That is not compatible with the examples that Opposition Members are giving.

I was explaining about limits on the values of properties prescribed under the legislation, but if the value of a property exceeds the limit it will not necessarily cause BES relief to be lost, because a company will be allowed to carry on some non-qualifying activities. If those non-qualifying activities are substantial, BES relief will not be available. What that means in practice will depend on the facts of each case, but the Inland Revenue's existing practice is that if non-qualifying activities amount to less than 20 per cent. of total activities they are not regarded as substantial.

That rule will ensure that the company specialises in the provision of qualifying tenancies, which will give some desirable flexibility. For example, a company may from time to time have money on deposit while it is preparing to buy or improve properties. It would clearly be wrong to withdraw BES relief because it received a relatively small amount of interest on its deposit. Indeed, these provisions reflect the general provisions of the BES for all types of companies. The Bill excludes sub-standard properties by reference to standards laid down in the Housing Act 1985 and the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987.

There is a further feature of BES relief that I should mention. Clause 50 imposes a limit on the total amount of investment in a company in any year that can qualify for BES relief. Ordinarily the limit will be £500,000, but for companies letting residential property on assured tenancies it will be £5 million. It is not our intention that the BES should be used to finance large property companies, which should have less difficulty obtaining equity finance from the markets. Thus, a limit is necessary. We want to enable a company to benefit from economies of scale in offering shares to the public and in managing a large number of properties. We felt that the £5 million limit, which we have extended to ship chartering, was about right.

The privately rented sector has been in continuous decline since rent control was introduced in 1915 in response to wartime shortages. It has continued ever since and has been reinforced by other Governments. In 1915, 90 per cent. of the population lived in privately rented homes, but today barely 8 per cent. do so.

The lack of a ready supply of rented housing has become a major obstacle to labour mobility. Many people have been losers, including many unemployed people. Many people have been unable to take jobs because of the lack of a privately rented sector in areas where work is available. The country has lost from the economic activity that has been forgone. A battery of legislation, statutory rent controls and other rent restrictions are largely to blame for that profoundly unsatisfactory position.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I press the Minister about this simple question and I want a simple answer. Can a person rent a flat from a company in which he is a BES investor? The answer is either yes or no.

Mr. Lamont: I answered that question earlier and said that I believed that the answer was no. I shall return to this issue later.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Is not the question asked by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) answered by schedule 4 to the Bill, on page 123, which says:

"In subsection (2) of section 291 (individuals qualifying for relief), after paragraph (a), there shall be inserted—

'(aa) a tenant of a dwelling-house of which the company is the landlord;'."

Consequently, a tenant is unlikely to obtain relief under that subsection.

4.45 pm

Mr. Lamont: The answer to the question is no, but I shall return to it if the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) wishes to pursue it.

The Government have decided to take action to reverse that profoundly unsatisfactory position by introducing a new assured tenancy scheme. Under its proposals, existing tenants will have the same protection as at present, but we are relaxing controls for future tenancies. Landlords and tenants will have a choice of two types of tenancies. Assured tenancies will provide long-term statutory security, and assured shorthold tenancies will give the tenant at least six months' security. In both cases, market rents will be payable. These proposals will provide the incentive for landlords to invest and, at the same time, give protection to the tenant.

For the new assured tenancy scheme, but not for assured shorthold tenancies, we are introducing tax relief under the BES scheme for a limited five-year period. We have a considerable task in pressing ahead with deregulation in the privately rented sector, and we believe that the extension of BES relief will give a significant boost to plans for deregulation. Decades of legislation have left this sector demoralised and in decline. It is important to reverse that decline, to give the unemployed a greater chance to find work and to give the population a greater choice in their housing.

Mr. Gordon Brown: The one thing that we can say about the Minister and his speech about tax concessions for the BES is that, despite all the criticisms that have been made of BES and of this new proposal in particular, his enthusiasm for the scheme remains undiminished.

Since the scheme was set up in 1983—it was originally intended to provide tax concessions for high-risk investment in high-technology industry to create jobs—Ministers have had to come to the House at least twice to say that, because of the increasing dependence on property and fixed assets, they intend to change the terms of the scheme. First, they had to admit that there were abuses in the scheme as it applied to expensive wines and antiques. They said that they intended to rule out those abuses. They then said that, because land and buildings form such a large part of the capital issued under the scheme, they would limit the amount that could be used to 50 per cent. Today, they appear to have turned full circle. Instead of saying that they will limit the dependence of BES companies on property they are saying that privately rented sector companies can be 100 per cent. dependent on property assets.

There is a further irony in what is happening. For months we have been saying that public funds that should have gone to the National Health Service, local authorities and social services departments for the benefit of the many have been going in tax concessions to private hospitals, nursing clinics, private health clinics, private schools and private accommodation for bed and breakfast for the benefit of the few. We said that those abuses should be limited. Yet the Government have opened up a new area of opportunity, with tax reliefs for a new area of the private sector, which is as yet unexploited under the BES. That is why we now have this proposal to extend BES relief to the private rented sector.

All Opposition Members recognise the housing problem—250,000 more people are on waiting lists than in 1979, there has been a 30 per cent. increase in the number of homeless people, there are twice as many people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and 500,000 houses have been lost from the rented sector, even after taking account of council house sales.

As has been said, more houses have been lost from the rented sector under this Government than at any other time since the infamous Rent Act of 1957. In response, we believe that the Government's proper action should have been to give funds to housing associations and local authorities to enable them to build houses, and to encourage housing co-operatives. We believe that, for the same money, local authorities and housing associations could achieve far more than is possible under this new business expansion scheme.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as the rents are to be market rents, it will often be the case, especially in London and the south-east, that rents will be higher than the cost of a mortgage, so the very people about whom we are worried, who cannot afford a mortgage, are hardly likely to benefit from the Housing Bill. Is that not a measure of the hypocrisy of the Government's legislation?

Mr. Brown: If my hon. Friend will stay with me, I shall return to that point, which goes to the heart of our objections to the scheme.

We know what the scheme will do for the private investors whom the Minister is anxious to encourage. We know that someone who invests £40,000 in a BES company can save £16,000-worth of tax. We know that, on the occasion of houses being rented, complete decontrol is proposed under the Housing Bill and that companies can charge whatever rent they want. We know, too, that, after five years, shares in BES companies can be sold without there being any liability to capital gains. We know what gains there are—they come three times over—for those who invest in such schemes. What we do not know and what we have not heard, however, are the gains to tenants.

There is no guarantee—the Minister confirmed it—of fair rents, of long-term security in accommodation or of good quality landlords. It is small wonder, therefore, that this proposal did not surface in the Conservative party manifesto. As far as we can understand, it has never been advocated by any local authority and it has never been put out to anyone for consultation, and when it was announced immediately after the Budget the reaction of housing authorities and housing associations was anything but supportive.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): The hon. Gentleman asks what is the benefit to the tenant. Is not the provision of new, additional rented accommodation of inestimable benefit to potential tenants?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman should read the details of the scheme. There is no guarantee of new accommodation. There is no guarantee that houses will be newly built rather than merely bought for renting under the scheme. As for rents, the hon. Gentleman will see clearly that the people who will benefit are not the migrant workers from the north looking for jobs in the south, which was the original intention of the scheme, but people looking for second flats, such as executives wanting accommodation in London or other major cities.

Mr. Gow: The hon. Gentleman unintentionally misled the House. He said that there was no reference in our manifesto to the proposal before the Committee. I shall read what we said:

"We must attract new private investment into rented housing—both from large institutions . . . as well as from small private landlords . . . to encourage more investment by institutions, we will extend the system of assured tenancies. When introducing the motion, my right hon. Friend followed precisely the promises made on page 13 of our manifesto.

Mr. Brown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not wish to mislead the House. He failed to mention that at the heart of the scheme is the provision of a tax concession to people who, primarily, will be top rate taxpayers. There was nothing in the Conservative party manifesto which said that public money—taxpayers' money—would go to BES companies or any other companies to stimulate the private rented sector. That is the basis of the objection to the scheme—public money is being used to finance accommodation in respect of which there is no guarantee of fair rent, secure accommodation or good quality landlords. That money could be far better spent by local authorities or housing associations to build more houses or to repair houses for which fairer rents are charged.

I shall consider the drawbacks of the scheme. The Minister said that it is based on the principle of assured tenancies, and that people who rent under the scheme will have what he would regard as security of tenure under assured tenancies. We know that assured tenancies will provide less protection than secure tenancies under the Rent Acts, that there are seven mandatory reasons for tenancies to be repossessed and several other discretionary powers, that among them is the failure of the owners to pay the mortgages and that another is rent arrears after three months.

We know that another justification for repossession, at least in England, is the offer of alternative accommodation, which is vaguely defined as "suitable". We know that one of the principal loopholes that is likely to be used is the landlord declaring his intention to redevelop, whereupon he automatically has the right to repossession without, as we understand it, even having planning permission to carry out the redevelopment. We know, therefore, that there will be considerable abuse of the scheme.

The Financial Secretary has conceded that there is a financial benefit to companies which sell up after five years, and therefore secure vacant possession to enable them to sell up. We know that assured tenancies are more likely to be five-year tenancies at best. The people who gain them are likely to find themselves in other accommodation at the end of that period.

It is small wonder that those who advise investors in this matter have already said—an estate agent has said it:

"the grounds for possession are much more extensive than under the Rents Acts and include some previously available only under part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 for business purposes".

The latest publication from the BES advisory group called "Best BES" concludes with a paragraph entitled, "Likely Exit Routes" thus:

"more likely perhaps properties will be sold either untenanted or with tenants".

The idea that people will be advised that they are in the business of providing long-term accommodation lasting beyond five years, and the guarantee that these will be assured tenancies which cannot be broken will, under the new Housing Bill, I believe, prove groundless.

What are the guarantees about the quality of landlords? Housing associations are debarred from involvement in the scheme. Assurances involving the registration of landlords under assured tenancies, are, as in the previous legislation, being abandoned. There is no provision such as that involving the Housing Corporation whereby landlords are registered and approved. The proposal for social landlords will not come within the remit of BES landlords—the Financial Secretary confirmed that. What guarantees do we have, therefore, that landlords who have no experience, no track record and no approvals or supervision will have any commitment to proper standards of property and the proper treatment of tenants?

Is it not as my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) suggested—that the landlords that local authorities and housing associations are trying to outlaw because of their atrocious record will be brought back to life? Indeed, under this scheme, they will be guaranteed state support in the form of tax concessions. Far from eliminating exploitative landlords, there is nothing here which will guarantee, under a social landlords charter or anything else, that the landlords who are being outlawed will not reappear. That is why one firm of accountants recently said:

"Rachman one suspects would not have been slow to take advantage of the scheme had it been around in the Sixties."

Under these proposals, Rachman is subsidised by the state with an open-ended commitment which the Government think might cost £40 million in its first year.

5 pm

That is not the only problem. There is another problem that the Minister did not properly address. We are being told by Ministers that the aim of the scheme is to help the mobility of people round the country. We are told that it is to help workers in the north find accommodation once they find employment in the south. However, the information available to us suggests that the rent for a house costing up to £125,000, which is the limit of the scheme in London, could be as high as £240 a week and the rent on a £85,000 house, which is the limit in the cities and turns of the rest of Britain, could be as high as £154 a week on a market basis. When rent is as high as that and the housing benefit maximum will be only £114 in Westminster, £70 or £75 in other parts of London such as Kensington and Chelsea, £88 in Camden, £39 in the west midlands and £34 in Humberside, there is little chance, even with housing benefit support, of the migrant worker being able to afford the rents that will be charged under the business expansion scheme.

In other words, the rents that will charged will rule out the very people the Government say they are trying to help. It is the higher paid business men, with the rent probably paid by the company, who will benefit from such tenancies. It is not the first home for migrant workers that it likely to result from the scheme but a second home for temporarily resident business men. That is not the group in the country with the highest claim upon the charity of taxpayers.

Instead of suggesting that ordinary average wage workers are likely to benefit under the scheme, surely it would be better if the Government took up the suggestions made by the Employment Institute in its pamphlet published a few days ago. It said that if the Government are to continue to reject the proper answer to these problems, which is an active regional policy, the best solution for people moving south is publicly provided accommodation at rents that people can afford.

On top of the insecure tenures that are likely to result, the high rents that are likely to debar all but the best-off workers and the failure to provide guarantees against bad quality landlords, we come to the problem at the heart of the scheme. The same amount of money as the Government will give in tax subsidies to the rich could have been used to build local authority housing, sponsor housing associations or develop housing co-operatives.

We asked the housing associations what they believed could be done with the sum of money that the Government have set aside for the first year cost of their tax concessions. They told us that for that amount of money they would be able to build more than 2,000 new houses —2,000 extra houses, not houses taken from the accommodation sector now—and charge sensible rents for them.

We asked the Association of Metropolitan Authorities what it could do with the same amount of money—£40 million. It said that that would be sufficient capital to enable it to borrow sufficient money to build 10,000 local authority houses a year. Therefore, in return for a provision that will probably bring about 1,000 rented properties in its first year, we could have provided the capital to help to build up to 10,000 local authority houses. That is the scale of the missed opportunity caused by the Government's obsession with providing tax reliefs under the business expansion scheme.

As a result of the Government's policies, the number of public sector starts is at its lowest since 1945—and at a time when the need is becoming greatest. At the same time, the annual figures for house building in the public sector have fallen from 81,000 in 1979 to what is estimated to be only 29,000 this year. The Minister should respond to us by saying that, after looking at the finances of the business expansion scheme and recognising that the £40 million could be far better spent in the provision of local authority or housing association finance, the value for money achieved by this proposal is far less than would be achieved in the public sector.

It is a tragedy that the Government seem to feel that there is a psychological need to circulate cash around property developers and speculators before it can do any public good. The truth is that ideology in the Conservative party is now so rampant that it would prefer to subsidise the private sector to do the job inefficiently than support the public sector to do the job efficiently.

We are aware of a number of deficiencies in the business expansion scheme and my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) will deal with them when he winds up. Money that should have been raised for businesses in the north has been diverted to the south, money that should have gone to small businesses has gone to large businesses, money that should have gone to the manufacturing sector has gone to the service sector and money that should have gone to projects that would have created far more jobs has been frittered away on projects that the Minister has latterly had to ban.

The truth of the business expansion scheme for private rented housing accommodation is that it has been founded on dogma about the benefit of the private sector. It has been fired by selective generosity towards top rate taxpayers who stand to benefit far more than any tenant can benefit from the scheme. It has been justified on the myth about the average migrant worker being able to do well out of the scheme when the Government know that that cannot be the case. It is riddled with abuses and anomalies that will force the Minister back to the House to change the legislation in a short time.

In this debate the scheme has been exposed for what it is. It is a mechanism for taking the housing problems of the many and transforming them into the tax havens for the few. The scheme will do little for those who most need housing help. The money that is being spent on it should have been given to local authorities and housing associations to allow them to build the houses that we need. It is for those reasons that we will vote against the scheme.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): There would be little disagreement in the Chamber about the fact that there is a need for greater provision of rented housing in this country. Home ownership has increased at a rapid rate. That is commendable and desirable if it is a matter of free choice. However, if home ownership is merely a matter of Hobson's choice for those who would prefer to rent but who are denied the opportunity because there is no supply of rented housing, it is not a matter for congratulation. Therefore, one reason for wishing to see a greater supply of rented housing is to give individuals the same choice of renting accommodation as they have of owning their home.

Mr. Battle: Is the hon. Gentleman still in favour of the policy of increasing the number of owner-occupied homes in Britain? At present, that stands at 62 per cent., and I understood it was the Government's policy to increase it to 75 per cent. Has it not occurred to the Conservative party that perhaps the reason for the shortage of private rented accommodation is that owner-occupation has increased? Is the hon. Gentleman now saying that his party feels that we have gone too far in the direction of owner-occupation and that we should pull back from that policy?

Mr. Watts: Not at all. I am happy that we should continue to encourage and assist those who wish to become home owners. However, there should also be the option of renting. I believe that we have reached the point where, because of the fast dwindling private rented sector, many people do not have that choice. That is what the proposals in the Housing Bill, supported by this clause in the Finance (No. 2) Bill, are designed to redress. Therefore, the first justification for what we are putting forward is the freedom of individual choice. The choice of renting is as valid as the choice of owning.

Mr. Winnick: How can the hon. Gentleman talk about choice? I do not know about his mailbag or surgeries, but people write to me daily asking for rehousing and they come to my surgery with housing problems. They do not know about choice. They cannot afford a mortgage. In the main, they are family people who, on their restricted incomes, cannot obtain a building society mortgage. How will they be in a position to pay market rents when in many cases the rent will cost more than a mortgage and when housing benefit is being drastically reduced?

Mr. Watts: I cannot understand how a market rent on a property could possibly be greater than the cost of funding a mortgage to purchase the same property. If it were, no would-be tenant would take that option. There will not be any choice for people who wish to rent if the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and his hon. Friends continue to seek to frustrate any measure designed to increase the supply of rented accommodation. If the Labour party does that, it will not in any way give greater choice either to my constituents or to those of the hon. Member.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Few lenders are prepared to advance a 100 per cent. mortgage. The difficulty for people trying to get a mortgage is in finding the differential capital amount. The attraction of rented accommodation—at least while people are establishing themselves in new working environments—is that people do not have to find the capital deposit that is required.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. In addition, people do not necessarily wish to put down permanent roots—as is often implied by home ownership—early in their careers, when they may make many job moves.

After choice, the second justification for seeking to increase the supply of rented accommodation is that it will improve labour mobility. Labour Members pooh-pooh this, but every Friday 30 or 40 pages of vacant jobs are advertised in my local newspaper. There are unemployed people in Walsall, North who would love to come to Slough for a job, but they are prevented from doing so because they cannot obtain accommodation there.

We have heard from Labour Members, predictably, the bleat for more council housing. The Labour party has only one solution to any housing problem—build council houses. That will not improve labour mobility. One need only look at the poor supply of council housing in the pool for the national mobility scheme to see how true that is. Obviously, the claims of existing constituents of local authorities are given priority over those of potential constituents. The demand of an existing tenant to transfer to better accommodation will always be accorded priority over the claim of someone who wishes to move into the area to take up employment. No conceivable level of capital expenditure on public housing will ensure that there is such an oversupply that the needs of those wishing to move into an area to take employment can be met by expansion of public sector housing.

There is no advantage for labour mobility in providing greater funds for the public sector. By contrast, the private rented sector is available equally to local people who are seeking rented accommodation and to those who want to move into the area for employment. There is no bar to the latter being granted a tenancy. They compete in the same market with others seeking rented accommodation.

The importance of expanding the private rented sector is recognised in the Housing Bill, which is the main vehicle for encouraging a resurgence of supply of private rented housing. Clause 49 of the Finance (No. 2) Bill, extending the business expansion scheme to assured tenancies, is intended to provide an initial boost to the intentions behind the Housing Bill. It is common sense and essential that the BES should apply to the same categories of assured tenancy as are defined in the Housing Bill. Any move to impose on housing investment further qualifications and requirements that would qualify under the BES—such a suggestion was made in amendment No. 1, which we have rejected—would blunt the impact of the useful boost that we are able to provide through this fiscal measure. Any such additional qualifications would be bound to defeat the pump-priming purpose of clause 49.

The Opposition have professed concern for the future security of assured tenants. Their form of protection would prevent potential tenants from ever having the opportunity to obtain a tenancy. It would so constrain the conditions under which anyone could offer accommodation for rent in the private sector that no one would offer it. The purpose of providing housing for rent, and providing for greater choice and the needs of labour mobility, would be defeated by the Opposition's professed concern to provide protection.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) criticised the tax relief that will be given under the scheme as squandering money that should be given to the National Health Service, local authorities, and so on. We have heard that bleat throughout our consideration of the Budget and the Bill. The hon. Gentleman missed the point that incentives to encourage investment maximise the benefit to potential tenants who are looking for property to rent and minimise the cost.

With tax relief at a maximum of 40 per cent., it must follow that two and a half times as much housing is provided for every £1 in lost tax revenue as would be provided if the same amount of cash were expended through local authorities. For every £1 lost in tax revenue through this relief, it would be necessary to spend £2·50 if the same amount of accommodation were provided through the public sector, and that is even making the generous concession that the public sector could provide housing as efficiently and as cheaply as the private enterprise system.

The Government's proposal maximises the benefit for people who need houses to rent—people for whom the Conservative party cares and whom the Opposition would sacrifice to their hatred of the private enterprise system in general and of landlords in particular. I give the clause my full support. I hope that it will be carried with a substantial majority to show how serious we are about expanding the provision of private rented accommodation.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): The Government's support of the clause is indicative of their attitude to a major problem. The primary purpose of the clause is to provide a tax shelter for a few, using the housing shortage as an excuse. It has potentially unpleasant side effects. There is no doubt that there is a major housing shortage. The high demand is ruthlessly exploited by many private sector landlords. There is a particular shortage of rented accommodation at prices that people can afford. The people who find it most difficult to move about and to secure any accommodation at all are those on low incomes, who cannot afford the price of housing.

The hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) asked why the private sector has been in decline. The answer is simple: successive Governments have subsidised home ownership. It is obvious that anyone who has the means will attempt to buy his or her own home because it is very much to his or her advantage to do so. That is why the private rented sector has declined throughout this century.

It is interesting to note that in home ownership the subsidy goes to the purchaser of the home, whereas under this scheme, rather than the public subsidy being given to the tenant, it goes to the landlord. On Second Reading I said that if the Government were serious about promoting tenants' choice it would be far better to subsidise tenants so that they could shop around and use their increased purchasing power to choose suitable accommodation. Instead of that, the cuts in housing benefit have greatly reduced the purchasing power of prospective tenants, especially at the bottom end of the market.

What is the answer to the housing shortage? The Government are providing an opportunity for a few people to obtain further tax relief. The clause provides a tax break for the better off. Rachman rides again, and this time the taxpayer is providing the horse.

Mr. Ian Taylor: The hon. Gentleman has got it the wrong way round. The Government are trying, through the medium of tax incentives, to provide much more rented accommodation for people who need it.

Mr. Darling: I shall develop that argument shortly. I do not think—and I do not think that the Government believe—that this scheme will bring on to the market the thousands of extra houses that are needed. In any event, any houses for rent will be at the top end of the market, particularly in the south-east of England, where high profits can be made. Other parts of the country where there is a demand for accommodation and a need to encourage increased mobility will not be so attractive to people who wish to invest under the business expansion scheme.

One of my objections to the clause is that it specifically excludes organisations such as housing associations which have done much to provide low-cost housing. Clause 49 (2) (b) specifically states that the qualifying activities are "activities which . . . are, during the relevant period, conducted on a commercial basis and with a view to the realisation of profits."

Clearly it is those who would profit from providing accommodation who will be subsidised.

I have three basic objections to the clause. First, it provides a tax shelter, giving a 40 per cent. discount to higher rate taxpayers. We must remember that only a few people in this country have between £500 and £40,000 to invest. They are not the ordinary, run-of-the-mill people. Very few people have that sort of money to play around with. The Government are aiming the provision at those who have a great incentive to reduce their tax liability and who have vast sums of money available to tie up for five years.

Mr. David Shaw: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that about 70 per cent. of all those who have invested under the business expansion scheme are taxpayers at below the highest rate and that many standard rate taxpayers have invested in the scheme over the years?

Mr. Darling: Most of the money has gone to those paying higher rate tax. I repeat that the scheme is aimed at those with substantial sums of money available to invest which they are willing to tie up for five years.

The second objection is that after five years investors can sell up and get a profit, free of capital gains tax.

The third objection is that in some cases those providing accommodation at the bottom end of the market will receive a subsidy from the public purse because their tenants will have their rents financed through the Department of Health and Social Security. A few will provide accommodation at that level, but for the most part investors will be looking for market rents to improve the return on their investment, and that means high rents. Those with low incomes will not be properly catered for.

The scheme provides a tax break for the rich instead of looking after the least advantaged. It exploits those who have no choice. Furthermore, it is open to abuse, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said. If the capital gains tax advantages are to be realised, it is necessary to ensure that there are no tenants in the building at the end of the period. Clearly, the value of a property increases if it is not burdened by tenancies. This will give landlords the incentive to get rid of tenants by using the powers to be made available to them under the Housing Bill. By arguing that there is alternative suitable accommodation and that he wants the house for redevelopment, the landlord will be able to get the tenants out and realise his profits.

Who is to police the scheme? The Inland Revenue has enough trouble as it is in tracking down people who push tax advantages to their very limits. To give powers to local councils would be anathema to the Government, who have a pathological dislike of local authorities. With the money that is to be made available, local authorities could provide properly supervised accommodation for those who need it. If we are prepared to make funds available by way of tax forgone under the business expansion scheme, it would be far better to give that money to public bodies to provide accommodation, without the need to make a profit, thereby making a saving to the public purse.

We should invest in the public sector. I cannot see what is intrinsically good about the private sector providing accommodation, or what is intrinsically bad about local authorities and public bodies providing it. We should be willing to look after local authorities and housing associations, many of which have a very good track record of providing accommodation where it is needed.

The Government have completely abandoned any regional policy. We know that most of the money under the business expansion scheme has been invested in the south-east and that less than 4 per cent. has been invested in Scotland. If we are serious about encouraging businesses to set up outside the south-east of England, we should provide accommodation and give industry other incentives to move out of the overheated south-east. One of the laudable aims of the Scottish Special Housing Association, for example, was that it sought to provide accommodation where the labour was needed. Such a policy would get round the argument of the hon. Member for Slough.

In short, the clause is a tax break for those who have always been looked after by the Government—the few people to whom the Government have always attached a high priority and shown great favour. Those who have are to benefit at the expense of those who have not. The provision is, first and foremost, a tax shelter. Everything about the scheme points in that direction.

The serious problem of homelessness is not being addressed either in this Bill or in the Housing Bill. The business expansion scheme will not solve the problem. It will not bring on to the market the rented accommodation that is so desparately needed. According to the Government, there was a need to cut back on housing benefit because it was an open-ended commitment. This proposal is an open-ended commitment if ever there was one. We do not know how much it will cost the Exchequer in tax forgone, yet the Government are prepared to allow this blank cheque to be written to look after the few. The provision is a tax break first and foremost, and it will take a great deal to convince us that it is anything else.

Mr. Gow: The Committee may want to take note of the fact that, having lost his amendment, the shadow Chancellor of the Social and Liberal Democrats has left us and made way for others on the Liberal Benches.

The debate is about whether the clause should stand part of the Bill, but quite rightly, my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) spent much of their time dealing with the housing aspects of the Bill. I, too, intend to talk mainly about the housing aspects, although at the very end I shall have to say something about the fiscal desirability of the proposal.

When the Chancellor made his Budget statement, he said:

> "For years, the shortage of private rented accommodation has been an obstacle to labour mobility. The Government's proposals to deregulate new rents are already going through the House. Deregulation will, over time, substantially increase the supply of housing for rent. But this will not happen overnight, and there is a case for a special incentive to speed up the process in the early years."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 1002.]

I entirely agree with what the Chancellor said on 15 March.

There is no doubt that there is available and empty today a large amount of property which is underused or unused. Part of the purpose of the Finance Bill is to bring that unused or underused accommodation into use. The fact that it is empty at a time of considerable homelessness is a massive indictment of the present state of the law. It is to the redressing of that evil that the Housing Bill is in part directed. That Bill is designed not just to bring into use existing unused or underused accommodation, but to achieve something that has virtually not happened at all in the past half century—to attract new investment into the building or conversion of housing for rent in the private sector.

5.30 pm

Everyone should welcome the provision of new investment for the building of houses or flats to let in the private sector The Labour party should welcome it, especially for its employment consequences. Labour Members are rightly deeply concerned about employment. They used to tell me constantly that we needed to spend more money on housing. Part of the reason for that was the fact that construction of houses and flats is highly labour intensive. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), clad in the Liberal colours, seeks to intervene from a sedentary position. He would be wiser to make his own speech in due course if he manages to catch your eye, Sir Paul.

I do not wish to be led astray by the hon. Gentleman who, like me, has this afternoon escaped from the Public Accounts Committee. Even he should welcome the prospect of still further employment in the construction industry as a result of this measure. It is not enough just to encourage those who have empty accommodation to let their property. It is high time for some new investment in the private rented sector.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why he has not supported an increase in housing investment programme allocations so that cities such as Leeds can put money into private rented accommodation through improvement grants in housing action areas? Local authorities have a strategy which seeks to deal with housing in both the private and the public sectors, but the cuts in HIP allocations have meant that money could not go into improving private rented accommodation.

Mr. Gow: As the hon. Gentleman well knows, in this financial year there has been an increase in the Treasury allocation to the public sector of housing, so his intervention is somewhat self-defeating. [Interruption.] I was comparing this year with last. The hon. Gentleman wants more money and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has provided it this year.

A dramatic increase in private ownership of houses must by definition mean a diminution in the rented sector, but one of the consequences of the drying up of the private rented sector has been that many people who would be only too happy to rent accommodation are today unable to do so. The hon. Members for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and for Dunfermline, East asked how we could prove that migrant workers would go into the houses and flats that will be built as a result of clause 49 of the Finance Bill. Of course we cannot prove that, but whoever goes into them, someone somewhere in the country will move up. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central should not laugh. It is self-evident that an increase in private rented accommodation will make itself felt throughout those parts of the kingdom in which there is currently an unmet demand for such accommodation.

The provisions of the Finance Bill on their own will make it more attractive for private money to go into the building of houses and flats for rent, but because for the past 50 years there has been virtually no private sector investment in that area, I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is right to give it an extra boost for the first five years. Clause 49 will accelerate the revival of the private rented sector by accelerating the long overdue return of private investment in that sector.

[Mr. Gow]

The Labour party is thus in a dilemma. Even the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), except in his most eccentric mood, must agree that it is no bad thing to have more accommodation available in the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman, however, finds it difficult to reconcile that with support for clause 49.

For us, there is no such dilemma. We support the renewal of the private rented sector and believe that clause 49 will accelerate that renewal. We congratulate both my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, who was here a moment ago, on the combination of the Housing Bill, which has completed its Committee stage, and the Finance (No. 2) Bill which has just started its Committee stage. We believe that the two together will achieve that purpose which has eluded Governments for the past 50 years, and the sooner the clause reaches the statute book, the better it will be for housing.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): It gives me some pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) as he has clearly shown the link between the extension of the business expansion scheme in the Budget and the Housing Bill. The Government argue that those two measures will bring an extension of the private rented sector because they believe that the problems of rent control for landlords have resulted in the decline of the private rented sector, but all the evidence collected by reasonable people who might be considered experts on this tells us virtually the opposite.

The vacant property survey carried out by the Department of the Environment showed that rent control was not the reason for empty property. The survey showed that 60 per cent. was vacant due to the poor condition of the property and only 2 per cent. because of the landlord's dissatisfaction with Rent Act controls. The Institute of Housing—scarcely a bastion of Socialist thought—took a similar view. One of its reports states:

> "In the Institute's view statutory controls on both security and rent have contributed to the decline but the evidence is inconclusive to say the least."

The Select Committee on the Environment, in its 1981-82 report, states that the real problem for the private rented sector has been the massive advantage to owner-occupiers through mortgage interest tax relief.

Mr. Winnick: I was a member of that Select Committee. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that when we took evidence from the Small Landlords Association, it dismissed assured and shorthold tenancies as being of no use, and evidence has shown that they were not taken up. Moreover, the association said that small landlords—the same probably applies to large property companies—would be willing to rent only if there was no protection of rents and no security of tenure. If those circumstances could not be achieved, there would be no incentive for the private sector to intervene in housing.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank my hon. Friend for pointing that out and for reinforcing the view of the Select Committee.

A survey carried out in London in 1983-84 found that fewer than two thirds of households were protected by the Rent Acts, and that during the period covered by the survey fewer than one third of new lettings were covered by rent controls. When one adds to that the ease of evasion of existing rent controls, one would have imagined that there would be an increase in lettings, but that has not been the case. The number of lettings has decreased.

In 1983-84, rents that were not protected in any way were an average of £345 a month. Protected tenants were paying £158 a month and registered tenants were paying £128 a month. Translated into current prices, that would mean £450, £190 and £154 a month, respectively. Rent controls have had little influence on the reduction of activity by private landlords. Indeed, the abolition of some controls after 1957 did not result in an increase in the private rented sector.

We can all agree with the view of the Select Committee on the Environment about what is needed to encourage private investment in housing for rent. Its report said that a healthy independent rented sector would require that landlords could obtain a return on investment similar to that obtainable elsewhere and that tenants could, without hardship, pay rents for suitable secure accommodation. There's the rub. Although it is possible for landlords to obtain a return on investment—I dare say that many right hon. and hon. Members pay hefty monthly rents for property in London with which their landlords are well satisfied—the problem lies in tenants being able to pay those rents without hardship. In a city such as London, many people could not dream of paying rents in excess of £400 a month.

The Halifax building society said that the market rent for a terraced property worth £45,000 in the south-east —it must be a little way out of London—would be £86 a week, whereas the mortgage repayment would be £76 a week. There would be no advantage in renting such a house.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Apart from the valid point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) about the need to put down a deposit on such houses, which must be a material factor, does the hon. Gentleman agree that mortgage interest rates can increase as well as decrease? Although the position is favourable at present, anyone going into the serious business of home ownership, which we wish to encourage and expand, should take those unpredictable factors into account.

5.45 pm

Mr. Griffiths: We can all agree about changes in the mortgage rate and that, until recently, mortgage interest rates have been at record levels under this Government, but we should not deal with that now. We must discuss what is happening. At almost every stage during the past 20 years it has been more expensive to rent decent accommodation that it has been to buy that accommodation, notwithstanding the problems of finding a deposit.

By introducing property companies into the business expansion scheme, the Government are not making a significant contribution to tackling the problems. Will there be a large take-up of the extended business expansion scheme? The Chief Secretary to the Treasury said that the demand for the business expansion scheme remains uncertain. Although the Treasury has estimated that it will cost £40 million in the first year, no one knows for sure. In April, there were reports that Barratts would become involved in the scheme in a big way, although according to the magazine Housing in May—only a few weeks later—Barratts was already considering drawing in its horns and not becoming so involved. When one considers the advantages of tax relief and owner-occupation against the fact that those who rent accommodation obtain no relief, it is difficult to understand how the scheme can be successful.

With the Government's policy of reducing higher rates of tax, although the 40 per cent. relief may prove to be attractive for many people, other schemes will be equally attractive and perhaps less burdensome than this scheme —unless the so-called assured tenancies prove to be less effective and less well-meant than the Government claim.

Under the Housing Bill, tenants will not be as well protected as they were in the past. Landlords could run a coach and horses through some tenancy agreements and get their tenants out without too much trouble. The Government more or less admitted as much by the exclusions that are provided under the assured tenancy scheme—for example, for redevelopment.

The outcome of the business expansion scheme is uncertain, yet the Treasury is committed to pouring millions of pounds into it. The money may not be spent at the end of the year. If in the first year the £40 million is not taken up, it will be interesting to know whether the shortfall will be used to provide money for home improvements or for building new properties in the public sector. We would welcome a commitment from the Minister on that.

We must also consider how the business expansion scheme has dispersed its money throughout the United Kingdom. Anyone from outside the south-east of England must wonder whether the scheme will do his region any good. In the south-east, the business expansion scheme took up 43 per cent. of the money expended in the last year for which information is available. In the same year, only 2·7 per cent. of the money available was spent in Wales. The amount spent in Scotland was less than 4 per cent. Less than 5 per cent. of the money went to the north-west, the north-east and the west midlands.

It appears, therefore, that this will be an opportunity primarily for unregistered and unlicensed landlords, who may not be controlled in any way, to run riot in the south-east because the money is unlikely to be spent elsewhere. The opportunities to boast that Rachman rides again, subsidised by the taxpayer, will be legion.

We call upon the Government to reconsider the clause and to expunge it from the Bill. We must ask whether it is a suitable vehicle for encouraging long-term growth in the private rented sector, or whether it will simply provide for a tax-subsidised property development scheme with a brief rental interlude. Obviously, the Government hope that, having extended the lollipop to potential investors in the property market, the aftertaste will be so sweet that they will keep their money there. They are building that hope on an illusion. All the evidence suggests that investors will make some money out of the scheme while it lasts, but, when it finishes in 1993, there will be a flight of investment away from this area, the money to provide decent housing at a decent cost will be lost, and we shall be no further forward in dealing with the problems of providing housing than we are today.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to have the opportunity to contribute briefly to this part of the debate. The Minister reminded the House that in the last 70 years the number of private rented houses has declined from 90 per cent. of the total to just under 8 per cent. today.

There are many reasons for that. First, although it may appear to be a strange reason, there are more houses, or dwelling units. Secondly, there has been a great growth in private home ownership, which Conservative Members welcome. Thirdly, there has been a growth in the past 70 years in the public rented sector; and, more recently with the housing association contribution, which is an invaluable part of our housing stock today.

I have no doubt that there is another reason—that until recently our rent legislation has been framed on the assumption that every landlord is a villain and every tenant a saint. We now have a more equable and fair regime of rent legislation. We must have this better balance on the one hand, while assuring security of tenure to the reasonable tenant on the other. The reasonable tenant represents the vast majority of tenants in this country.

There have been one or two inconsistencies in contributions from Labour Members. The hon. Members for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) have fairly pointed out that the business expansion scheme is taken up mainly in the south-east. Clause 49 may or may not assist the provision of housing principally in the south-east, where, in certain areas, there is a particularly severe housing shortage. If the Bill is effective, it will help meet the housing needs of people in our capital city and in the south-east generally.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): Given the tight constraints on planning permission in my constituency and in many parts of the south-east, will the hon. Gentleman tell us how that additional housing subsidy can have any effect other than to fuel price inflation and carry owner-occupation further beyond the pockets of many people? It is already way beyond the reach of many people in the south-east. I presume that the hon. Gentleman is a market economist. Will he explain how, with extra money available and no more housing being built, this can be other than property speculation subsidised by the state?

Mr. Chapman: I say, with relief, that I am not a market economist. I do not quite know what that means. However, I take the hon. Gentleman's point. There is pressure for development in the south-east, and there is a shortage of land for development in the south-east, compared with many other parts of the country. Nevertheless, there are plenty of opportunities and there is much spare land in the south-east. I can take the hon. Gentleman to parts of this great capital city and show him sites that are crying out for development.

Be that as it may, not all the housing needs in the south-east can be provided on existing under-used or derelict urban sites. I do not wish to stray too far from the clause, but I invite the hon. Gentleman to attend the Chamber this time next week, as I have been fortunate enough to draw first place in the ballot and intend to bring up the subject of planning controls and the problems facing us, particularly in a sustained expanding economy.

Mr. Darling: I do not want to accept the hon. Gentleman's invitation to attend a debate next week, but he appears to be developing a theme that was developed to some extent by his hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). He appears to be saying that if a business expansion scheme creates tenancies in London it will create surplus accommodation in other parts of the country. Is not most BES property likely to be at the top end of the market, because market rents will be charged?

[Mr. Darling]

Even if someone came to London to take up a place, that would not help someone in Newcastle who wanted to come to London to seek work but did not have very much money.

Mr. Chapman: The hon. Gentleman makes a series of important points, but the issue cannot be divided into black and white. There is a capital limit in paragraph 13 of schedule 4. I do not think that there will be provision only at the top end of the market. House prices and land prices are extremely high in the metropolis, and these prices will be reflected when comparison is made with other areas. I do not accept that the business expansion scheme will play into the hands of those who can afford to provide the most expensive private rented accommodation.

It is said that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is wrong to provide a tax incentive which is open-ended. How dreadful. It is then said that we shall be lucky if 1,000 houses are built under the scheme. There is a difference between offering a tax incentive and finding public funds to pay for subsidies in another area of housing. I am not saying that we should have one to the exclusion of the other. I am advocating a fair balance. We need to encourage private rented sector investment much more than we have done in recent years.

If I recollect correctly the words of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), he said something about ideology running rampant on the Conservative Benches. Having listened to some of the contributions of Opposition Members, it is clear that the well-worn political prejudices are alive and thriving on the Socialist Benches. I am confident that with such antiquated thinking the great Socialist ship will go down at the next general election, as it has in the past three.

I welcome the provisions in the clause and the schedule. Private rented dwellings can and should have an important role in housing provision. An increasing number of young people are unable to start the process of home ownership, for reasons which have been mentioned already, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor). These young people need temporarily and initially to find rented accommodation so that they can save for a deposit and then step on to the ladder of home ownership.

Secondly, there is increasing mobility in our nation. People are seeking jobs in different parts of the country. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) will be aware that, in some areas of the south-east and some parts of London, employers are crying out for people to work for them and are offering attractive income levels. If the business expansion scheme is a success and creates market rents, those who take employment in the south-east and in parts of London, and who have come from other areas, will be able easily out of their incomes to afford market rents. We must keep an open mind if we care about encouraging the maximum number of people to be in employment.

My third example—the list is not exhaustive—is that there are people who, for various reasons, choose not to own their own home. Instead, they choose to rent. Some of these people would not qualify by any calculation for public sector housing, and provision should be made for them. We must encourage more private capital into rented housing because of the demands that I have mentioned, and others.

I accept that the business expansion scheme is not the only approach, but I am sure that it will make a valuable contribution. Clause 49 will help to add accommodation to the existing meagre stock. I have gone carefully through the detail of these provisions, as have hon. Members on both sides of the House. I recognise that there are exclusions that apply to tenure and type and value of property. After a careful study of the clause and the schedule, I see nothing to prejudice a tenant or prospective tenant.

For example, the Bill excludes property where the landlord or the owner demands a premium. As well as having the market rent established—that has to be done by agreement—the landlord will be prevented from saying, "I can charge only this amount of rent, but if you pay a higher premium than the other person who wants the place, you can have it." I accept that there is a shortage of housing in my area, and I see advantages in the scheme.

I have one detailed query to put to the Minister; and it is appropriate to do so now, as we are in Committee. It concerns the provisions in paragraph 13(1) of schedule 4, which relate to clause 49. I cannot understand why the market value limit is £125,000 in Greater London and £85,000 elsewhere. I agree that there should be value limitation, but I should like to know why my hon. Friend the Minister hit upon these figures. My constituency is an area where the metropolis meets the countryside. In one road in the constituency one comes across the boundary with Hertfordshire. One of the houses in that road adjoins a house that is deemed to be in Hertfordshire. Why should a value limit of £85,000 attach to the house in Hertfordshire, while the house next to it, which is in my constituency, is the subject of a £125,000 limit?

More important, does the limit refer to a dwelling house that may subsequently be divided into units of accommodation, or does it refer to the unit of accommodation that might be derived out of a greater whole? That is worth looking into. Much depends on the value of properties in any one area when compared with values elsewhere. Prices are extremely high in constituencies such as mine and in many other parts of London and the south-east. This could be a material factor. I shall be glad if my hon. Friend will respond to those points. However, I fully support the intention and spirit behind the clause and commend it to the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When the business expansion scheme was originally introduced, I did not show outright hostility, because I believed that it could be made to work. That is still my belief. In a way it has helped in part to create jobs in the regions and in other parts of the United Kingdom. However, what has always worried me is abuse.

It might be worth reflecting for a moment on the origins of the scheme and the conditions in which the Government produced it. It came at a time when industry was not investing in the way that it should. The Government then produced a number of schemes, some of which were quite successful, to produce jobs. Those schemes were on a small scale and they were operated in every part of the United Kingdom. One of the problems at that time—to some extent it persists—was that high interest rates meant that there was a reluctance to invest. Some people said that it was easier to sit on a pot of gold in the bank and live on the interest than to invest. Against that background, schemes such as BES were introduced to offset the damaging effect of high interest rates on the small investor, especially in areas of unemployment where, invariably, small investors were not too inclined to congregate. Such areas do not normally have living within them people of great economic means. Workington is such an area.

When we originally discussed these matters three or four years ago, I made a somewhat ambiguous speech in that I partially welcomed the scheme but drew attention to a number of areas where I believed that abuse would take place. If I may say so, with modesty, I have been proved to be correct because there have been abuses. I can only repeat what I said then. I believe that the Government have produced a perfectly good scheme, but it was not targeted to avoid the inevitable abuses that have taken place.

I am concerned about one area of abuse. Although the Minister has replied to two of my interventions to reassure me, I want to present him with a scenario in which abuse will occur. I hope that I will not have to return to this point in two or three years' time in the way that I have had to refer to abuses about the scheme in general today.

I refer to comments made by Mr. Stephen Howe of BES Investment Research. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) referred to those comments earlier. However, we seem to have missed the point that a new ceiling has been introduced for the business expansion scheme. Many people have set up companies which have benefited from the scheme. They now believe that there will be a policy shift in the organisations in terms of where they place BES money. They believe that the ceiling will prevent them from adopting—or direct them away from adopting—the schemes that I would have wanted or perhaps would not have wanted if they involved abuse, and force them into investment in housing.

To what extent has the Minister been able to assess in advance the impact and scale of that movement away from the previous investment areas towards housing? The statements from Mr. Stephen Rowe are quite strong. He is quoted in the Financial Times of 16 March 1988 as saying:

"It would take a lot of money into the residential property market which would otherwise have gone into genuine businesses."

Mr. Rowe might be correct. I hope that those areas where the scheme has been successful will not suffer as a result of the switch in investment.

I also received a letter from a gentleman in Kent, an area in which I have taken a great interest over recent months. The gentleman, whom I am unable to name today, drew my attention on 2 February to an area of BES investment which he believed was an abuse. I do not know whether it is an abuse, but it certainly shows some remarkably high returns. He said:

"The scheme was prompty abused by the City so much so that some measures were introduced to prevent this, but it would seem without much success. One measure was to limit investment in property to 50 per cent. of the funds raised which has turned out to be something of a joke."

He refers to BES managers looking for a minimum return of at least 30 per cent. per annum, something that was quite easy to achieve with retirement homes where a profit of £100 a week per patient is considered modest. He writes:

"I know of one home here in the south-east"—

that is in Kent—

"which was purchased for £200,000 under the BES and has now 50 occupants each paying an average of £1,034 a month plus extras."

That is £600,000 a year to run a home that was purchased for £200,000 under the business expansion scheme.

If the firm concerned is offering a high quality of care in Kent, I am sure that we would all welcome it. However, I wonder whether the Minister believes that that is the kind of investment that he would have wanted to attract when the scheme was established. Surely the benefits paid by the Department of Health and Social Security, which in many areas are the minimum fees that these homes ask, are enough to insulate people against the heavy expenditure involved in setting up and running those homes.

I want to refer to my previous interventions and the Minister's responses. The Minister told me that someone could not be a tenant—not officially—of a house or flat in which he had invested under the business expansion scheme. Is it not possible for one, two, three or four people to join together and invest in a house? They might split up that house, perhaps in London, into a number of flats so that each flat, dependent on how the scheme was put together, would fall under the £125,000 threshold for London. If I have been slightly misled in that, I am sure that the Minister can imagine another scenario in which four people might join together to invest in that way.

Mandatory grounds for repossession after four years of assured tenancy require that where the landlord acquired the property before the tenancy began and now wishes to occupy it as his only or principal home, notice must normally be served that this ground will be used before the tenancy begins. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) tells me that those are self-standing grounds for repossession.

Is it not possible that someone seeking to secure a £40,000 discount, which is effectively what the tax deduction would mean, on a £100,000 investment, might make that investment and put in place someone who could not be deemed an associate under the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, specifically section 291, subsections (2), (3), (4), and (6)?

Is it not possible that those people might not necessarily be associates? Might somebody be installed in that residence at a rental agreed between the two parties—remembering what the Minister said—which might effectively be £1 a year? Is it possible that the tenant might be fictitious or even a friend? Someone may become a resident and be given notice at the beginning of the term of four years that he would hand over tenancy after four years while the investor simply lived in the property.

The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) intervened earlier when I put my case—no doubt because he is wise about these matters. He said that my point was dealt with in section 291 of Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. Perhaps he would intervene now and tell me where the Finance Bill precludes the scenario to which I have referred. Could a person put a friend in a flat in London, save £40,000 or £50,000—through a concession on the higher rate—with an agreement signed at the beginning of a four-year term to state that at the end of that time the friend would release occupation and the investor would move into the flat having procured it with a 40 per cent. discount? Is that not possible?

If it is possible, it will be an abuse. If the Minister wants to check the records, he need simply look back at the abuses that I predicted some years ago about a scheme that I supported. I am not rejecting the scheme out of hand. However, I believe that it will lead to abuses.

I want the Minister to assure us that the abuses will be dealt with. The Inland Revenue cannot police these matters. We cannot have teams of funny little men from the Inland Revenue running around blocks of flats in London to see who is living with whom, who happens to be in residence or whether there is any connection between a person in residence and someone investing in a business expansion scheme who has gained 40 per cent. relief. I do not believe that the system works like that. Understanding the way in which the Prime Minister's mind works about civil servants, I believe that that is the very last thing on earth that she wants to happen. Will the Minister give me an absolute assurance that that will never happen? If he cannot do so, he has a duty to the Committee to withdraw the whole proposition or to amend it in such a way that the Committee will be reassured.

Mr. Quentin Davies: This Government have been faithful to two important principles in their fiscal policy so far. The first is the desirability of simplifying the tax system. The second is the desirability of getting away from the fatal temptation—I almost called it addiction—to which so many of the Government's predecessors were subject.

That temptation consisted in using each Budget to introduce new tax incentives or penalties with a view to persuading various agents, in one sector or another of the economy, to change their behaviour patterns and to take decisions they would otherwise not have taken—or not to take decisions they otherwise would have taken. Over the years, that tendency has produced, in effect, an increasing attempt administratively to second-guess the market. The distortions that that produced were cumulative and did enormous damage to our economy. I am glad that we have moved away from that tendency to the extent that we have over the past seven or eight years.

The Government have acted pragmatically and not dogmatically. They have been prepared to retain fiscal incentives where there seemed to be a special case for them and introduce fiscal incentives where there seemed to be a very special case for doing that. There are two questions for the Committee to examine. First, is there really a special case? Secondly, if there is, is the particular means of intervention foreseen in clause 49 the appropriate one?

Mr. Gow: Before my hon. Friend addresses himself to those questions, will he explain to the Committee why not a single member of the Liberal party is in his place?

Mr. Davies: Since entering the House I have attempted to interest myself in a number of matters. I find some of them simple to grasp and others more complicated. Some of them I find completely inscrutable. The behaviour of the Liberal party falls into the latter category, and I can offer no help or light in regard to the interesting mystery to which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) has drawn attention.

It seems to me more appropriate, where a special case of the kind I have outlined has been identified, to intervene by means of a tax break rather than by means of a subsidy —simply signing a cheque with taxpayers' money, which is the preferred course in such circumstances of the Labour party. My reason for making that distinction is twofold. First, a tax break tends to reinforce the logic of the market rather than go against it, so it takes investors a little further in the direction in which they might otherwise have been inclined to go more cautiously—rather than turn people back from the course which the market appears to have dictated.

Secondly, as has already been pointed out, if one produces a tax break, one generates a great deal of additional money that is leveraged into the same purpose. I refer to the arithmetic that we have used today, and to the fact that for every £1 that it costs the taxpayer by way of tax breaks, we shall generate £2·50 of new money for investment in private rented accommodation by means of clause 49.

Another question to which I address myself is whether the argument has been made that the priority of rented private accommodation represents a special case. I believe that it does and I shall mention three reasons that seem to me to be cumulatively convincing. First, there is the present state of the private rented sector in this country, but I shall not elaborate on what was said by my right hon. Friend the Minister when he spoke of the important social and economic need to revive the private rented sector.

Secondly, the tax incentive will fit neatly, productively and fruitfully with the Housing Bill that is before the House, with its new concept of assured tenancies, which will involve the tenant paying a market rent. If one has market rents, one finds again that one can with reasonable confidence predict the future real value of rents and therefore of properties, which is the function of rents, over a number of years. It is arguable that, under a restricted rent system, one can more easily predict nominal values. What is important for investment decisions are real prices and values.

If we are to offer the private investor a stake in projects to provide private rented accommodation, and if we are to syndicate investments of that kind, as is foreseen in the Bill, one must produce a reasonable projection of cash flow. That can only be based on some reasonably reliable estimate of what the real value of the rents to be derived in future years is likely to be.

The third reason why I believe there is a special case, and why clause 49 embraces a good and appropriate concept, is that, whether one likes it or not, the memories of the past 30 or 40 years have had a traumatic effect on private investors. The history of rent controls and of excessive security of tenure way beyond the long-term interests of the tenants themselves has left investors with many unhappy memories.

Mr. Battle: Like me, the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) served in Committee on the Housing Bill. He will surely agree that schedule 2 to that Bill took away tenants' rights under which there was a measure of discretion. There could be a row with the landlord about whether tenants should be evicted, but the Bill is weighted in favour of the landlord, who can say that his tenants will be mandatorily evicted. Tenants have lost their rights and could now, for very small reasons, be evicted. Does the hon. Gentleman think that that is a good thing? Also, what guarantees can he give, from his financial analysis, that moneys from rents will be reinvested in improving properties, to ensure a decent private rented housing stock in Britain?

Mr. Davies: To answer the hon. Gentleman's second question first, the question whether the return from an investment is reinvested in the same sector will depend on the continued attractiveness of that type of investment. The Housing Bill, together with the provisions before the Committee in clause 49, will go a long way, inasmuch as governmental and legal action can, to ensure that investment in the private housing sector remains attractive.

As to security of tenure, one must strike a balance between the apparent and immediate interests of tenants in providing maximum security of tenure and the fact that, if there is absolute security of tenure, no landlord will rent his property. I believe that the Housing Bill strikes a good balance, but that matter is slightly outside the scope of the Committee.

My final point is that, after the traumatic effect of the controls on investors of the past 30 or 40 years, if we are to attract investors—and particularly private investors—back into private rented accommodation, given that there is tremendous hesitation in doing that, we must do something to counterbalance the ill effect on investor confidence of the policies which have been pursued up to now.

Governmental action up to now has been very damaging. I feel that it behoves us to take the need of the economy seriously, and do something to sugar the pill additionally before we invite a whole new range of private investors to swallow it. The Bill does that very neatly. It is well conceived and presented, and clause 49 merits the support of the House.

6.30 pm

Mr. Battle: Although the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) made great play of the fact that this proposal was in the Conservative manifesto, those of us who served on the Standing Committee considering the Housing Bill were slightly surprised that it was not mentioned once during that Committee stage. The Minister said that the provision builds on the assumption that the Housing Bill will become law. In practice, it will go much further than that Bill towards undermining the rights of tenants.

Conservative Members have expressed the view that rights have swung too far in the direction of the tenant and that power has shifted away from the landlord. However, the myth should be scotched immediately that any tenant has—in the words of the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies)—had "absolute rights". That has never been the case. Under the Housing Bill, tenants' rights to appeal are being eroded and leverage is being provided for the landlord. Clause 49 of the Finance Bill will underpin and assist the landlords by giving them a tax break—as the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding put it—from the Treasury.

During consideration of the Housing Bill, the Minister for Housing and Planning made great play of introducing a new concept, that of the social landlord. I suspect that he introduced that concept because he felt that the reputation of landlords—particularly private landlords—needed tempering, because there were examples of bad landlordism throughout the length and breadth of Britain. The Minister introduced the notion of a social landlord charter—stretching the language, as it were, between the public and private sectors.

Will those who take up the business expansion scheme have to register with the Housing Corporation? Will they have to register with anyone? Will they be required to have any record in property management, tenant management and rent management? Will the rent be controlled? We know that controls on rent will be taken away by the Housing Bill, but we were also assured that any increase imposed by a private landlord would be matched for those who could not afford to pay by an increase in housing benefit—a public subsidy. That point should not be neglected by those who refer simply to the capital subsidy, taking no account of revenue subsidies.

What guarantees can be given that people will have decent and appropriate housing to rent in the private sector? What will the clause do to improve the standard and quality of housing? It is sometimes suggested that the Rent Acts alone got rid of the private landlord. The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) nods in assent. It seems to me that the private landlord was disappearing in the city that he and I represent long before the Rent Acts were introduced.

In Leeds, at the turn of the century, 72,000 private rented houses called back-to-backs were built in the inner-city areas alongside the rivers and the courtyards of the pubs and inns. That was so that they could plug into the drainage systems and inside lavatories did not have to be provided. Although indoor lavatories had been invented by the Romans, the builders decided, for some unknown reason, to cut the costs of providing decent sanitation. As a result, the drainage system was overloaded. Lo and behold, at the turn of the century the streets where those houses were built were rife with tuberculosis. It was not the Labour councils that introduced the Public Health Acts and public housing to replace the private sector because it had done such a bad job in providing decent conditions.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that we have moved on rather since those days? We have Town and Country Planning Acts, building regulations and Public Health Acts, with all of which any new builder must comply whether he is building for rent or for sale. The problems that the hon. Gentleman recites from the past are hardly likely to recur today.

Mr. Battle: I am delighted with that intervention. I invite the hon. Gentleman to visit my constituency, for some of the conditions that existed under private landlords then exist today. I could show him flats full of people who live in basements—[Interruption.] Conservative Members may find it amusing, but when environmental health inspectors have to take to court the cases of elderly people who live in basements without a window to provide them with light because the landlord is breaking the law, I take the view that such conditions must be tackled.

When a local authority includes in its plans a housing action area to put money direct into the private rented sector and to improve and tackle those conditions, when an £88 million plan is put before the Government and their response is that the city can spend only £22 million so that there can be no grant for the private rented sector, we do not get very far in tackling the problems of at least 50,000 houses in the private sector in Leeds which are sub-standard and in need of major repair and modernisation.

[Mr. Battle]

I hope that the fabric of houses is part of the equation. This is not simply an issue of supply. Quality is also important. Homes must be supplied that people find decent, at a rent that they can afford. The clause is merely a pocket-liner. It has nothing to do with the supply of decent and appropriate housing, and it will not improve the housing stock. Everyone, from the Duke of Edinburgh downwards, has highlighted the crisis in Britain's housing stock. Nor will it give tenants security. Conservative Members may hide behind the word "assured", but they need only read the report of the Committee stage of the Housing Bill to see how past assurances have now been weakened.

I urge hon. Members to think again and to reject the clause. It will do nothing to improve housing conditions in this country.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): It is fortunate that I should rise immediately after the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), because I should like to present a rather different perspective on current events in the city of Leeds, which contains both our constituencies.

Before I do that, it may be worth recalling that the business expansion scheme as a whole came out of particular needs in 1979. Those of us who at that time were specially concerned with small business and the development of investment in it—in the many sectors of the economy where venture capital was woefully lacking—saw the scheme as a prime lever to get money into those sectors. It has been spectacularly successful. The Peat Marwick McLintock report showed that 50 per cent. of the investment raised under the scheme would not have been raised without it.

Perhaps the most valuable part of the scheme is that it signposts areas of investment in which further investment is needed. It signposts them in such a way that further investment follows rapidly from the wider market place, because it is seen, when the business expansion scheme leads, that there is an opportunity for the venture capital market to benefit from it.

It follows from that that the needs for the scheme will vary. The position is now quite different from that of 1979: there is a substantial and much better developed venture capital market. It is surely wrong to adopt a static approach to the business expansion scheme, because if there are sectors of the economy in which there is patently adequate investment in more conventional forms, there is no need to provide tax relief in channelling further money into it.

It is right that from Budget to Budget the Government repeatedly look at the business expansion scheme and try to change its focus to meet changing needs. That seems entirely sensible and logical. From the speeches that we have heard, it seems that no hon. Member has denied that further substantial, varied and flexible investment that can come only from the private sector is needed in rented accommodation. I have no difficulty in warmly endorsing the clause as a method of encouraging a new investment focus by the private sector in rented accommodation alongside the reforms in the Housing Bill.

I must say to many of my hon. Friends who have spoken that for me, and no doubt for the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), this is not a matter of helping migratory workers going to live in the south-east. If that were the sole justification for the scheme, it would be relatively slender. In Leeds and my constituency, we do not want our workers migrating to the south-east. I came here today from the opening of a £20 million factory in my constituency. It represents the state of the art, as do so many other places in my constituency and in Leeds. When I visit the chamber of commerce and the chamber of trade, they say that we need more skilled people, and we do not want them to be drawn off to go to the south-east.

However, we have a corollary of the problem of the south-east. Because of the success of certain areas, many of the people born and bred in those areas find it difficult to find homes there. Particularly in a constituency such as mine, which consists of countryside abutting on to a city, people who are born and bred in the towns and villages, because of the rapid rise in house prices—exactly the same phenomenon as the south-east—find it difficult to live and work in their home areas where they first chose, and where they have spent so much of their lives. Equally, people who have retired and who are looking for sheltered rented accommodation find it very difficult to find homes near their families who live in the villages and towns around the cities.

It seems to me that success of the business expansion scheme will be measured not just in terms of whether it encourages further investment into the south-east in rented accommodation, but whether it provides a solution in other regions of the country, in areas where there is a desperate need for further rented accommodation. We are hoping that it will produce more units of accommodation out of the existing housing stock.

In many of our constituencies, there are large houses that are not really economic as single family homes. There are many derelict farm buildings which could be converted into smaller homes for renting. That is precisely the operation in which the private sector, and in particular the small business man, seeing an opportunity, needs some fiscal encouragement. With land prices rising as rapidly as they are in the area that I represent—in the triangle between Leeds, York and Harrogate—it is extremely difficult for someone to buy land and buildings for rented accommodation unless there is some form of financial incentive. I believe that the success of the scheme will be judged in those situations.

A number of hon. Members have mentioned that much of the business expansion scheme seems to be centred around the south-east. About a year ago, along with some of my hon. Friends who are particularly interested in small businesses, and with some BES fund managers, I investigated why so much investment was channelled into the south-east. The answer was really quite simple. The scheme is relatively expensive to set up and relatively complex to administer. There needs to be a measure of sophistication in terms of the advice and the support services for setting up and running such schemes.

Until now, all too often those centres of sophistication and the people who are able to handle that complexity tend to set themselves up in the London area. They have many opportunities to invest the money available to them, and naturally, they choose to invest it in places that are most convenient for them to run, to look at, to visit and to monitor.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that the limit of £500,000 which the Budget has put on individual investment under the BES, is likely to draw the scheme out of the City of London, because it is unlikely to prove all that attractive to the big institutions that were investing very large sums in individual companies? I believe that one of the objectives of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was to make the funds more locally generated.

I agree with my hon. Friend, and I hope that there will be more investment outside the south-east. Does he agree that the scheme could be attached to some of the enterprise agencies that could get together groups of business men who could provide funds locally? That would be much more attractive and would target the scheme to small businesses that need investment, and not to larger ones who can get it through venture funds.

Mr. Batiste: My hon. Friend, who is chairman of the Small Business Bureau, makes the point that he made so eloquently in his submission to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor prior to the Budget for precisely that kind of amendment to the Bill. I agree with him completely that the lowering of the ceiling to £500,000 may well have that effect.

Equally, one has to bear in mind that the scheme is still complex to administer and that the start-up and monitoring costs can be relatively high. The growing sophistication of the professional advice services in the provinces may provide the best answer, alongside the development of the business expansion scheme. In the various islands of investment around the country where there are very high instances of BES investment, it is usually because some big player locally has taken a scheme by the scruff of the neck and decided to make it work in that area.

The scheme has unlimited potential for further investment in the regions, and in that context it is particularly sad that, with the sole exception of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), Opposition Members have been so critical of the scheme. I have no hesitation in welcoming it. I believe that it will produce many more units of accommodation out of the existing housing stock, it will improve much sub-standard accommodation, and return it to the rented market, it will assist the mobility of labour, and I hope that it will also increase the accommodation available in the cities and villages of the north and the midlands.

My only regret about the debate is that, with the sole exception of the hon. Member for Workington, there has been such a negative attitude to this important scheme from Opposition Members, and most importantly from the Opposition Front Bench, but that is hardly surprising, as the views of today's Labour party are increasingly irrelevant to today's needs.

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) says that our arguments are irrelevant to housing in Britain. I must say that his speech was totally irrelevant to the housing needs of so many people throughout the country.

We have heard two main themes from Conservative Members. First, they argued the case for private investment in housing, and one would expect that from Conservative Members. Their second theme is that the housing shortage in the rented sector is all the fault of wicked Socialist controls, and that, if there had not been rent controls since 1915, there would be a flourishing rented sector in the private market, no one would need rented accommodation and all would be absolutely well. If anyone believes such nonsense and such an absolute fallacy, they would believe anything.

During one of my interventions in his speech the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) disputed that market rents would be as much as, if not higher than, a mortgage. Last November, the Evening Standard carried some advertisements for rented accommodation that clearly would be outside the Rent Act 1977. Houses were advertised for rents ranging from £130 to £240 a week. Some flats—not many, but one or two one-bedroom and two-bedroom flats—were costing up to £70 a week.

Bearing in mind the escalating property prices in London and the south-east, surely it is obvious that market rents under the Housing Bill would not be much less, if anything, than the rents which were quoted in the Evening Standard last November. That demonstrates the Opposition's basic point that people who are in desperate need of rented accommodation will be unable to afford market rents of the kind that will be allowed by the Housing Bill.

We do not object for reasons of dogma or prejudice. We object because the genuine housing needs of our constituents who write to us or who come to see us will not be satisfied if the only rented accommodation that is available is to be let at market rents. That is why we oppose the Housing Bill and this clause.

I intervened during the speech of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) because I consider that the private rented sector has a limited role to play. I do not believe that housing should lead to private profit. It is perfectly acceptable that an owner-occupier should be able to let a room in his house. In many cases that is highly desirable, but housing should be in owner-occupation or provided by local authorities and housing associations. It should not be the subject of private profit.

Mr. Butterfill: Would the hon. Gentleman oppose the provision of private sector rented housing by building societies, insurance companies and pension funds? That is what happens in other countries, which provide better housing conditions than we do.

Mr. Winnick: I would oppose it to the extent that market rents would be payable by the prospective tenants, for all the reasons that I have given.

The business expansion scheme is a form of tax shelter that can easily be abused. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) referred to one form of potential abuse. I shall be interested in the Minister's reply. In his usual simplistic way, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who is not in the Chamber, said that the provision of new rented buildings would provide work and that it would help to reduce unemployment. But assured tenancies and shorthold tenancies will not necessarily be provided only in new buildings. Those two forms of tenancies under the Housing Bill will apply to all new lets. The hon. Member for Eastbourne cannot have read the Housing Bill if he believes that such tenancies will apply only to new buildings.

When the Housing Bill becomes the law of the land and landlords let on shorthold tenancies, the minimum length of letting will be reduced to six months. I am aware that the business expansion scheme does not apply to that form of letting, but I do not accept that the Bill will lead to the provision of a large amount of new rented accommodation.

Sheer dogma and political prejudice lie behind the Government's policy not to allow local authorities to build and not to allow genuine housing associations to provide much-needed rented accommodation. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) implied that local authorities are not perfect. I accept that there have been many shortcomings over local authority accommodation, but local authorities have done a great deal to replace the slums and hovels that were such a curse. They have provided accommodation at a reasonable rent and enabled ordinary people, often for the first time, to live in decent, adequate accommodation. I pay tribute to the local authorities. That is why the Opposition are not on the defensive.

Local authorities are said to be too bureaucratic and centralised. My local authority was one of the first to decentralise its housing services by providing 28 neighbourhood services and neighbourhood offices throughout the borough. That example has been copied by many other local authorities. The way to satisfy the acute housing needs of those who cannot afford market rents or mortgages is to provide them with local authority housing or housing association accommodation. They have as much right to be adequately housed as any Member of Parliament.

The Minister said that the Housing Bill goes further than the Rent Act 1957. That is interesting. When the Secretary of State for the Environment spoke on Second Reading of the Housing Bill, I compared that Bill with the Rent Act 1957, but he said that the Housing Bill does not go as far as the 1957 Act. Who is right?

I do not deny that we face all kinds of disadvantages when we grow old. However, one advantage of getting on in years is that one remembers, certainly if one has been in politics for many years, what happened in the past. I am one of the very few Members of Parliament who served on a local authority when the Rent Act 1957 was being implemented. That local authority in north-west London, despite all its difficulties at that time, had to spend a large amount of money on rehousing people who were lawfully evicted as a result of the Rent Act 1957.

Conservative Members say that all the trouble stems from the tight rent control restrictions that were introduced by a wicked Socialist Government, but I ask them to consider what happened when the Rent Act 1957 was enacted. We were told that if the rented housing market were deregulated, plenty of accommodation would be provided, but by the time that the Conservative Government left office there had been, to some extent as a result of the 1957 Act, not an increase but a substantial reduction in rented accommodation. The Housing Bill will have much the same result. Tax shelters, tax relief and subsidies to those who provide private rented accommodation at market rents are completely without justification. For that reason, we shall vote against the clause.

Mr. David Shaw: It is appropriate that before I comment on the clause I should declare an interest. I have been involved in the setting up of a number of business expansion scheme companies. I have also been involved in the setting up of two business expansion scheme funds. I am pleased to say that those companies and funds have resulted in the creation of about 1,000 jobs.

It is relevant to consider the success of the business expansion scheme. Since 1983 it has provided £150 million a year and created about 20,000 jobs. It has also helped small businesses. Often, the money that was raised was below £100,000. Up to half the small businesses that have been given help are not in the south-east. That is quite an achievement. To help small businesses in areas other than the south-east has been a problem, but a number of the clauses will help them to expand. An investment limit of £500,000 in any one company is being imposed under the expansion scheme. That is helpful. Furthermore, the ability of a fund to invest its money after the end of a tax year will help a number of regional funds.

I commend the BES to the House. The Government will find that the tax revenues of the more successful companies that have been set up under the scheme will exceed the relief given to private individuals to invest in those companies. One of the companies with which I have been involved has already paid the Government, in PAYE, national insurance, corporation tax and VAT, more than the relief originally given to the investors. The BES is not intended only for those at the top of the income range, because 70 per cent. of those who receive it are below the highest rates of taxation.

It is good to extend the BES to investment in housing. Over the past 20 years there has been little money for private housing. I used to live in my right hon. Friend's constituency of Kingston upon Thames. He used to have advice centres and, as one of the members of the housing committee, I used to assist from time to time. Many of the complaints and problems with which I have to deal relate to housing and the shortage of rented housing. Most hon. Members will confirm that they have similar problems in their constituencies.

Job mobility and the opportunity for people to move around the country to find jobs elsewhere will be helped by this measure. Much reference has been made to the fact that the money given will go to executive second homes. Nothing could be further from the truth. There is a limit of £125,000 in London and £85,000 for the rest of the country, and those amounts will not be used to purchase executive second homes.

The overall limit of £5 million for companies is about right. It will attract much investment, and it has been suggested that about £500 million might be invested in a short time under the BES if the clause is passed. I hope that it will be passed, because that money will provide a lot of rented accommodation.

I was upset when the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) quoted from the BES publication, because he did not quote the last paragraph, which said that people will not be required to leave their homes at the end of the five-year period and that it should be possible to sell the houses to pension funds or investment trusts. I was upset by the suggestion that housing associations will be excluded from involvement in the scheme. There is no reason why they should be. They may be excluded from receiving money under the scheme, but they are not excluded fron managing the housing. I expect that many companies set up under the scheme will delegate management to housing associations.

The opportunities offered by the extension of the BES will be tremendous. It is with regret—I am advised that the Front Benches wish to make their winding-up speeches—that I cannot speak further about the benefits that the clause will bring.

Mr. Beith: I shall be brief mainly because I shall not have to respond to the second jibe this afternoon from the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). He is not present and is unlikely to be for some time.

In the preceding debate I gave the reasons why I believe that it is wrong to proceed with the BES for private sector rented housing unless it is accompanied by significant safeguards for tenant protection on levels of rent and security of tenure.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose——

Mr. Beith: I promised to be brief, so I shall not give way.

The Minister said that he was willing to consider elements of protection, but no Conservative Member has shown any willingness to accept such a measure. Nor have I been convinced yet that the incentive offered calls for a 40 per cent. level of tax relief. The Minister may yet convince us about that, but I find it hard to believe that he will do so, given the nature of the asset that is involved in rented housing—property. The security and prospect of capital appreciation of property is such that it is unnecessary to have 40 per cent. tax relief. Surely standard rate relief would be adequate for the purpose.

The Minister has left us with ample reason for voting against the scheme in the form that he has presented it.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I should like to raise a couple of matters that have not been raised so far about the way in which the Government believe that clause 49 fits in with the Housing Bill and why it does not achieve the objective, shared by all hon. Members, of improved choice in housing.

Clause 49 is an attempt, late in the day, to cover the inadequacies of the Housing Bill, which was presented as the great deregulating measure which would lead to investment flowing back into the privately rented sector. It was said that it would do so by creating two new forms of tenancy—the assured tenancy and the assured shorthold tenancy.

During consideration of the Housing Bill, the point was made that the assured shorthold tenancy conferred so many additional advantages on the landlord, compared with the assured tenancy, that it would undermine the effective use of the assured tenancy. That point was never denied by Ministers, and I think that it sunk in that there were severe dangers that the assured shorthold tenancy, which gives an approximate six-month tenure, would continuously undermine the likelihood of tenants and landlords agreeing on longer tenancies of 12 months or two years.

Clause 49 emanates from the Government conceding the argument of Labour Members that the assured shorthold tenancy will undermine the assured tenancy if nothing is done about it. As a result, by clause 49 the Government have made the assured tenancy a little more attractive to the landlord by conferring on it but not on the assured shorthold tenancy the benefits of tax incentives at the top rate and the capital gains tax exemption if one sells at the end of four years.

The measure has nothing to do with an attempt to improve labour mobility. If anything, it will have the reverse effect. If the Government intended to improve labour mobility one would have expected them to confer tax advantages on the shorthold assured tenancy, which is far more likely to be used by people moving into a town for the first time. It was expected that people could have an assured tenancy for anything up to 10 or 15 years. This measure cuts out the assured shorthold tenancy. It is merely an attempt to cover over the difficulties that the Government got themselves into with the assured tenancy. A tenancy that confers almost no rights on a tenant is bound to be more attractive to the landlord than one that confers some rights.

The logical dilemma facing the Government is that they do not know what to do to create a level playing field for landlord and tenant. They have undermined the concept of the assured tenancy and are attempting to cover it up with a most unsatisfactory tax break, which itself shows every sign of following the path of failure that the BES has followed since 1979.

Certain specific sectors, which are not highly risky, will tend to attract all the BES investment. That has been the case with old people's homes, and I fear that the BES will not help to cover the equity gap in highly risky investments and new technology but will grow and be invested in safe investments such as property. As investment previously went to old people's homes, it will go in future to the private sector. This measure has no contribution to make to solving our labour mobility problems.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): I am sad, but not surprised, that the Government are introducing this clause to increase the potential for exploitation of tenants and to champion the rights of private landlords.

The clause reinforces the Housing Bill, which has deprived tenants of many rights and in particular robbed spouses of rights of succession. We all accept that there are conscientious private landlords. Indeed, when I meet them in my constituency they complain of being driven out by the irresponsible, crooked landlords, who, they tell me, receive support and succour from the policies and philosophies of the Government.

I shall not vote for the clause because elements of the private sector have an appalling record. Yesterday, Mary Marshall, the director of Age Concern, said:

"Some private sector homes are making huge killings" exploiting the elderly. Like me, she believes that "the law is not strong enough to deal with the cowboys."

We know that the Government have done nothing to strengthen the law to protect private tenants. An excellent article in the Sunday Post yesterday revealed that the private sector has not been contracting as all Conservative Members have claimed. Provision for people in private nursing homes in Scotland has doubled in two years to 6,132, and with it has come rampant exploitation. One company operating in Scotland is making £6·5 million a year, mainly from the Department of Health and Social Security, and plans to increase its income to £9 million over the next year.

The £85,000 tax limit on properties will have an horrendous effect on the Edinburgh property market. In Marchmont in my constituency there are already far too many flats in multiple occupation—properties where the landlord's interest in the behaviour of tenants is limited to their payment of rent. I fear that the clause will cause an explosion of such tenanted flats, to the detriment of neighbours and local residents. It is not that the clause will increase the number of houses or flats. Owner-occupied flats will be taken out of the home-owner market and replaced by tenanted flats, and flat prices will soar as a result.

We are entitled to ask whether the money could be better spent. There are 12,000 families on the council house waiting list in Edinburgh alone, 2,000 of them in my constituency. The Government's investment for one dwelling in Edinburgh under BES is estimated by the Treasury at £34,000. The same sum would enable the local council to finance a loan to build 10 houses to rent.

The clause shows that, when the Government have to choose between giving the private sector £34,000 to provide one house and giving the public sector the same money to provide 10 houses, their heads are ruled by dogma and not by the practical necessities which the whole country would support.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The Opposition have made clear for some considerable time their doubts about the operation of the business expansion scheme. We believe that it is an inadequate and inappropriate mechanism for raising equity finance for high-risk small ventures. It is, however, a highly appropriate mechanism for avoiding tax; and even when the tax rate being avoided is 40 per cent. rather than 60 per cent., though less attractive, it is still attractive.

The Government are introducing changes, which we shall no doubt spend some time discussing in Committee, to ensure that there is a limit of £500,000 on the investment. It is only a marginal improvement. It is worth noting that that limit does not apply to the rented housing provisions which form the burden of clause 49.

The Government have relied heavily when praising BES—the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) did it again today—on the Peat Marwick report. The Financial Secretary has mentioned it several times in our debates thus far, but he ignores and fails to tell us that that report dealt only with the first year of BES. It did not go into any detail for subsequent years.

During the later years, however, there have been changes in the nature of investment under BES. For example, there has been a significant increase in the average size of investment. There has been an increase in the proportion invested in non-manufacturing enterprises. There has been a growth of prospectus issues as opposed to individual issues. Above all, there has been an increase in the cost per job of BES. It is worth remembering that, even in 1983-84—the first year of operation—the cost per job of BES was higher than the cost of creating or saving jobs in other small business promotion ventures.

Mr. David Shaw: Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on something that I said—that one of the companies in which I am involved will pay more in tax to the Government after five years than the Government gave in tax relief to investors?

Mr. Smith: Of course I heard what the hon. Gentleman said. I was listening with great care, as he is closely involved with seven BES companies and funds. His comments ignore the fact that that is not the universal experience. Moreover, the Peat Marwick report reveals that BES has been more successful at saving than creating jobs. It is worth examining carefully what money the Exchequer has paid out, and what it has got in as a result.

The business expansion scheme has many flaws, but clause 49 represents a wrong use of an already inefficient scheme. It is being applied inappropriately and unacceptably when it comes to the provision of housing. It is worth noting that Housing said of the BES:

> "Cut-price property deals giving short-term pets for those who can't afford to buy their own homes and tax breaks for the rich—that's the reality of the Government's latest scheme to boost private rented housing."

That is indeed the reality. We should consider what will be provided by the scheme that is proposed in clause 49.

Rents will be high. They will be at market levels. The Housing Bill, which sets up the system of assured tenancies, establishes a two-stage process for the establishment of rents. The first is what is called an agreement between landlord and tenant. It is effectively the amount at which the property is advertised by the landlord. The second stage is the rent assessment committee, which acts as a final court of appeal. It has a statutory duty to take account of market forces. There is no question of fair rents. There is no mention of a rent officer or of a comparison with housing association or local authority rents. Market forces, and market forces alone, will determine rents.

Mr. Butterfill: Can the hon. Gentleman conceive of any way in which it would be possible to encourage the private sector to invest in the provision of housing for rent if it had to provide the subsidy? Does he agree that if subsidies are to be provided, they must come from the public?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman ignores the basic point at the heart of the debate. A subsidy is being provided by the taxpayer through tax relief available under BES. We do not believe that that is a particularly sensible or sensitive way in which to target public subsidy.

If the hon. Gentleman wants to find out about market rent levels, he should come and see what happens in my constituency. Only this morning, at my advice surgery, I saw a family with no recourse to local authority accommodation who are desperately looking for somewhere to rent. They have no capital and cannot afford to buy. The cheapest property for rent in the private market that they can find in the borough of Islington costs £200 a week.

If the Government say, "Ah, but housing benefit will take care of their problems if their income is low," they have clearly forgotten that the higher rent limit on housing benefit for the borough of Islington is £61 a week. Clearly, that puts such accommodation out of the reach of anyone in any of the categories mentioned by Conservative Members as those likely to be helped by the scheme. It puts accommodation to be provided at market levels under this scheme completely beyond the reach of ordinary people. The rents will be high and, as a result, ordinary people will not be helped by the provision of accommodation under the scheme.

Not only will rents be high, but there will be little security of tenure. "Assured tenancies" is an Orwellian phrase to describe tenancies that will be anything but assured. There are 12 different grounds for possession in schedule 2 to the Housing Bill. For example, ground 7 enables possession to be regained by a landlord simply because work is to be carried out on the accommodation. That will be the easiest, simplest, and, I predict, the commonest ground on which possession will be sought. Also, the prospect of sale to another landlord offers little ground for security under the provisions of that schedule to the Housing Bill.

If a BES company is looking for a mechanism to maximise its profit, maximise the capital gain available to shareholders, which will be tax-free at the end of a five-year period, and a way to get rid of the tenants involved, all it needs to do, at the same time as it sets up the BES-funded company, is to set up a non-BES-funded company with the same directors. It can sell the property from the first to the second at the end of five years and put the capital gain that will be made to the benefit of the first.

It will be easy for landlords to get rid of awkward tenants. They have requirements and needs and, on the whole, they tend to be treated badly by private landlords. The Financial Secretary was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) whether he would agree that redevelopment is one of the grounds on which repossession can take place and that it would be to the financial benefit of the company to sell after five years. His answer, which I heard clearly, was yes. If he now wishes to say that he has had second thoughts, I should be delighted to give way to him. If not, that is clearly the position—that it is to the financial benefit of the company to sell after five years.

Not only will rents be high and tenancies anything but secure: it will be a relatively unregulated sector. Who will police the operation of the assured tenancies offered under the scheme? Who will police the companies involved? It will not be the Department of the Environment or the local authority. The only body that will be able to do that is the Inland Revenue, and that is hardly geared up to examining whether a social form of landlordism or a bad form of landlordism is being offered.

The tenancies will be at high rents and there will be little or no security for tenants. The letting will effectively be unregulated. It will be bad, high-cost housing and the scheme will do nothing for tenants. It will do everything for those who want to avoid paying tax. It will do nothing to solve our housing crisis, but it will do everything to create splendid new tax shelter opportunities. I strongly urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against clause 49.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Members for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) referred to the wider changes that had been made in the business expansion scheme. The hon. Member for Workington said that he had been fairly favourably disposed towards the scheme originally. Indeed, I remember that. If he will forgive my saying so, it was slightly curious to observe his anxiety about the new ceiling that we have imposed because he is worried that it might affect genuine growing businesses, whereas the thrust of much of what was said by other Opposition Members was that the Government had not done enough to curb abuses under the scheme. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Workington for saying that he approaches the matter with an open mind.

The hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury and for Dunferline, East (Mr. Brown) did not acknowledge what has happened under the other changes in targeting the BES much more on the smaller company. One reason why we have been able to do that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) said—I know that he is strongly in favour of the change that has been made—is that after several years' experience of the scheme we now have a venture capital industry that is more able to finance start-ups and new businesses. We do not need a tax relief that goes on for ever for that sort of business. After a few years' experience we decided that it was better to return to the original purpose, which was to concentrate on the smaller business and start-ups.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury criticised the BES because, he said, it has started up too many businesses in the south and not enough in the north. He might have acknowledged the fact that the change that we are to make is likely to have a much more favourable effect on areas such as the north where there are fewer entrepreneurs and start-ups.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) said, it has been widely commented that the changes are likely to bring about a much more even spread of BES activity throughout the country. I am sorry that Opposition Members do not feel more able to welcome the changes in the scheme, which have been widely welcomed outside and which are overwhelmingly sensible.

The hon. Member for Workington raised a specific point about avoidance under the BES as applied to the new lettings. He described a situation in which somebody might let a property to an associated person. My hon. Friend the Member for Dover drew his attention to schedule 4(4). That was a reasonable point to make, but I believe that the hon. Gentleman's imagination has been at work. He will be aware that the provisions for the BES as applied to rented property are also governed by other general BES provisions.

Section 289(11) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 has a general anti-avoidance provision as applied to the BES. It says:

> "An individual is not entitled to relief in respect of any shares unless the shares are subscribed for and issued for bona fide commercial purposes and not as part of a scheme or arrangement the main purpose, or one of the main purposes of which, is the avoidance of tax."

That provision covers the point made by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I would be happy to be reassured, but the Minister must be able to assure the Committee that the Inland Revenue will be able to establish the position. The staff are not in place to check on the personal lives and habits of people and the relationships that might exist between people who might be able to make an arrangement which would be an abuse and which the Inland Revenue could not identify. The Minister has not given me that assurance. He simply says that the matter is covered by the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. I cannot find that provision.

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is changing his question. His first question was: is this covered by the Act? The unequivocal answer is yes. His second question was: is it impossible? We do not want an army of snoopers. The Revenue's provisions and resources in this respect are similar to those that it has for checking on many other types of abuse. Given the relatively small number of business expansion schemes, I do not believe that it will be impossible for us to identify those sorts of cases.

[Mr. Lamont]

7.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) asked about the limit of £125,000 in Greater London and £85,000 elsewhere and about properties that were subsequently divided. We determined the figures after consultation with the Department of the Environment. We could have fine-tuned them more for different areas, but that would have made the legislation much more complex. Where property is divided, the value of each separate dwelling as let on an assured tenancy is relevant, not the value of the whole property.

Some Labour Members seemed to doubt that we were talking about the provision of new lets. They may not all be new build, but they will be new lets. That is provided for in paragraph 15 of schedule 4.

The Opposition have very much misrepresented the position on security of tenure. Assured tenancies will provide considerable security of tenure. A landlord will be able to repossess a property only by court order, on one or more specified grounds. The general approach is similar to that in the Rent Act 1957, although the grounds for possession differ in some respects. The vital difference is that tenants will pay market rents. Housing benefit will be available to qualifying tenants.

Mr. Battle: Will the Minister concede that whereas the grounds for a change in security of tenure under schedule 2 of the Housing Bill were discretionary before, they are now mandatory? This means that a tenant will have no right to appeal, but will have to go if the landlord applies for a court order.

Mr. Lamont: The grounds have changed in a number of respects. There are fewer grounds than under the original Act.

The Opposition have spent a large part of the debate talking about harassment and Rachmanism. I do not know how resonant the name of Rachman is today, but obviously the Opposition's points are serious. I suggest, however, that they are confusing the incentive to get vacant possession, which exists under present legislation, with deregulation and tax relief, which, if anything, will work in the opposite direction and lessen that incentive. There is no point in getting tenants out if they must be replaced with others, which is what a landlord would have to do under the business expansion scheme, because he must be in the continuing business of letting property.

It is less likely that people will have that incentive if there are market rents, because the values of properties tenanted and of properties untenanted will be much closer. The Opposition, in their desire to misrepresent our proposals, again have totally ignored the steps taken by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to strengthen the criminal law and the civil rights of tenants.

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the Minister confirm two crucial points? Will he confirm that it is easier for a landlord to gain possession under the terms of schedule 2 to the Housing Bill than it is at the moment under the Rent Acts? Will he confirm that there is every incentive for a BES-established company, after the five years of BES funding are up, to gain vacant possession and sell the property?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am answering. The hon. Gentleman assumes that at the end of the four-year period the landlord can regain possession of the property. Under the Housing Bill, when the tenancy ends, a statutory periodic tenancy arises automatically, so the tenant's security is protected and the landlord cannot count on getting possession. The hon. Gentleman misrepresents the position.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury talked about security of tenure. It is clear that, despite all the assurances that have been given, the Opposition simply want to surround rented property with a plethora of controls that will make it extremely unlikely that anyone will ever rent any property. There must be some grounds on which people can regain possession.

Mr. Winnick: A few moments ago the right hon. Gentleman said that there was no incentive for an unscrupulous, Rachman-type landlord to get the existing tenant out. There will be every incentive if the Housing Bill becomes law. I accept that the tenant continues to have protection, but once he leaves voluntarily, or is forced out, that place can and will be re-let, at market rents. There is every incentive for the unscrupulous landlord to act as he would under the Rent Act 1957, and the Minister for Housing and Planning knows that very well.

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman ignores what I have said about what happens at the end of a fixed-term tenancy. A periodic tenancy then arises automatically. A tenant also has the right to go to a rent assessment committee.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East talked about the money that could have been spent on other types of property instead of on this tax relief. As my hon. Friends the Members for Slough (Mr. Watts) and for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) said, we are getting, not just the 40p in the pound tax relief, but the additional non-taxed relief money, which is going into the provision of rented accommodation. Through tax relief we are harnessing additional resources from the private sector and putting them into the provision of rented property.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said that tax relief would not help the tenant. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding said, it will help the tenant if it increases supply. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said that it would not help to alleviate the problem of moving from the north to the south. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) said, it will if it increases supply. Of course tax relief will not do so on its own. We need deregulation as well. The Labour party always threatens to reimpose controls, but all the evidence is that rent decontrol by itself cannot always increase supply. The threat of legislation from the Labour party is one factor that has forced us to put forward the proposition that there should be tax relief.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) does not believe that anyone should be allowed to make a profit out of private housing. No doubt he was opposed to anyone making a profit out of the supply of owner-occupied housing a few years ago. No doubt he would extend his argument to many necessities—clothing, food and so on—but most of us think that the basic things in life can be provided better, more efficiently and at a higher quality by the private sector.

My hon. Friend the Member for Slough said that the Labour party has only one answer—to build more council houses. We believe that if decent rented private accommodation were available on a larger scale it would appeal to the British people. The Labour party will find itself overtaken by events and opinion, just as it was on the sale of council housing and on privatisation. Labour Members will live to regret the day that they voted against the clause.

ABOLITION OF AGGREGATION OF INCOME

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

It may be for the convenience of the House if I deal with clause 98 at the same time.

It must be rare for so short a clause as clause 31 to introduce such a fundamental change in the structure of our tax system. The clause repeals the rule deeming a married woman's income to belong to her husband for tax purposes, which has determined the tax treatment for married couples since 1805. The rule has become increasingly anachronistic as the role of married women in society has changed, and it is widely resented by wives who find that it denies them independence and privacy in their financial affairs. Making the husband responsible for tax on the couple's combined income forces the wife to disclose her income to him, including details of any investment that she may have and the amount of her savings income, however small. That situation is simply no longer acceptable.

The correspondence received by the Inland Revenue shows that the present system is unacceptable. One lady recently wrote to an inspector of taxes saying:

"I trust there will be no objection to your writing to me personally as I am now old enough to reply to my own letters."

We have moved a long way from the days when the Inland Revenue never wrote to married women, and things have changed since the day when a tax officer concluded a letter to a husband announcing a meeting about the wife's tax affairs:

"Please bring this letter and your wife with you."

Another lady gave her opinion of the present state of affairs when she received a statement from the Inland Revenue by writing back:

"I feel that all your letter would have needed was a penny black to add that final touch of Victoriana, don't you agree?"

Speaking from memory, I believe that another lady wrote as follows:

"My husband played no part in creating my savings though he is only too willing to spend them."

There has been a strong feeling for a long time—reflected in the position taken by the various parties—that the present rule was unsatisfactory.

The rule also imposes a tax penalty on marriage which can result in a married couple paying more tax than two single people in otherwise similar circumstances, just because they are married, and it can discourage a married woman from working if her husband is liable to higher rate tax. At present, a couple share a single basic rate band against their combined incomes and the wife does not have a full personal allowance of her own. Also, the wife's earned income allowance cannot be set against any savings income that she may have, so this is taxed at her husband's rate from the first £1.

The clause sweeps away this unfair and antiquated system and in so doing it recognises married women as taxpayers in their own right for the first time. From April 1990, a husband will no longer be responsible for his wife's tax affairs. They will each be taxed independently and take individual responsibility for returning their own income, when called upon to do so, and for paying their own tax. As a result, married women will be able to have complete privacy in their tax affairs. Tax offices will communicate with them directly about tax matters and all repayments of tax overpaid on their income will be made to them. The present separate assessment provisions will therefore be redundant.

As individual taxpayers, the taxable incomes of husband and wife will be worked out separately. They will each have their own personal allowance, and any other reliefs for which they qualify in their own right, and their own basic rate band. The tax penalty on marriage and the disincentive to work will thus be removed and there will be no need for the present wife's earnings election arrangements. As a result, 1·6 million wives will have less tax to pay on their income than under the present system. Three quarters of them have incomes of less than £5,000 a year, and 700,000 of them are elderly.

The elderly obtain a particular benefit from independent taxation because of the change in the taxation of national insurance pensions which elderly married women receive on the basis of their husband's contributions. These pensions are currently taxed at the husband's rate. Under independent taxation such a pension will be treated as the wife's income, and her personal allowance—age-related if she is 65 or over—will be available to set against it. That is a very significant change for thousands of elderly couples.

Elderly married men also benefit because a pension of this kind, and any other income that their wives may have, will no longer be treated as the husband's income for the purpose of the income limit on age allowance. As a result, 130,000 more elderly married men will qualify for age allowance. More than 90 per cent. of elderly couples who pay tax at present will be better off, and 160,000 will be taken out of tax altogether.

We believe that it is right that husband and wife should enjoy the benefits of independence and privacy which independent taxation will bring, and that the discrimination against marriage inherent in the present system should be abolished. But it would be wrong and unrealistic for the tax system to take no account of marriage. That is why we have provided in clause 32 for a married couple's allowance and retained the rule that transfers of assets between husband and wife are not chargeable either to capital gains tax or to inheritance tax. Our approach throughout has been to treat husband and wife as individuals rather than as a single unit in determining the liabilities on their separate incomes, while continuning to recognise the special nature of their relationship in a legal and social context.

Independent taxation will be introduced in April 1990—the earliest practical date. Hon. Members may recall that other proposals that have come before the House, such as those for transferable allowances, could not be implemented until 1993, so it is a significant advance to be able to implement this reform from April 1990. In the meantime, the Inland Revenue will be preparing for the change by setting up new tax records for married women, making changes to computer systems and training staff in the new procedures. It is all to easy to underestimate what is involved in all that. Taxpayers will need to take no immediate action and most will have to do nothing extra. During 1989, the Revenue will take the initiative in contacting taxpayers when information is needed to help set up the new system and launch it smoothly. Since the change will not take effect until 1990, taxpayers and their advisers will have time to familiarise themselves with the new legislation before it is implemented.

The revenue cost of independent taxation is estimated at £500 million in 1990-91 and £1 billion the following year. The full-year Inland Revenue staff requirement to operate the new system once it is up and running will be of the order of 2,000 to 2,500. Those are substantial costs, but I make no apology for them because we believe that the policy is right in principle and demands the commitment that we have demonstrated that we are prepared to make. The bulk of the revenue cost arises from treating married women fairly for the first time as independent taxpayers and would arise under any form of independent taxation.

Clause 98 extends the principle of independent taxation to capital gains tax. April 1990 is the earliest possible date for introduction. Because of the aggregation of capital gains and income, it is impossible to bring forward the capital gains tax side by itself, and there might be some criticism from hon. Members if we did. But it is clearly right that, having had independent taxation on income, we should also have an independent allowance on capital gains, and if one accepts the principle of independent taxation for men and women, that principle should apply equally to capital gains tax.

These are far-reaching proposals, and I commend them to the Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I hope that it will be helpful if I say at the outset that the Opposition will not divide the Committee on clause 31, but we shall divide on clause 98.

We do not wish to divide on clause 31 because it sets out the principle, not the detail and, as is fairly well-known, the Labour party is strongly committed to moving towards truly independent taxation. We favour creating a taxation system that treats married women as equals, not as dependants of their husbands. Married women are entitled, if they want it, to privacy in their financial affairs, and the resources that are available for redistribution through the taxation system should be distributed so that the poorest feel the benefit the most and first.

How typical of this Government and this Budget that even on an issue where there is no difference in principle between the two sides of the House, they have managed to ensure that the wealthy will benefit disproportionately from the changes. The Minister said that the proposals will help pensioners. So they will, but they will especially help pensioner couples with an income between them of £21,000.

One quarter of my electorate are over pensionable age, which is not untypical of many metropolitan constituencies. No doubt those who have incomes of £10,600 each will be grateful to the Government, but I did not meet many people with that sort of income during last week's local government election campaign. The 90 per cent. of pensioners will gain little out of the proposal—the poorest 90 per cent.—said what they thought of the Government. Pensioners who I met asked about housing benefit, not about income tax. Even those who stood to gain from income tax cuts were well aware that they could lose 85 per cent. of that in housing benefit reductions.

Disappointingly for the Government, no pensioner said to me on last week's election trail, "Mr. Brown, we have always been Labour but now that we have retired we thought that we would each take our £40,000 business expansion scheme tax relief through the Government's disaggregation proposals, so we feel obliged to vote Conservative." That was not being said on the doorsteps of Tyneside last week. Perhaps popular capitalism has not yet reached the streets of Walker, but it is much more likely that many people elsewhere, as well as in the north-east, do not have the money to take full advantage of the new opportunities. In Walker, that probably applies to Conservative voters, too—all 114 of them.

It is an interesting reflection on the way that the Budget has been received in different parts of the country that in 1974 the Conservative party controlled Newcastle city council. Yet today, out of 78 councillors, the Conservatives have only six and do not have complete control of a single ward. The defeated former councillor who led the Conservative group before the election summed it up thus: "We've been massacred. They voted against the Government." I do not know whether the Minister agrees with that analysis. I see him smiling, but I promise not to take his smile as an endorsement of that view.

The story is similar throughout the north-east. Those who have not benefited from the Budget are making their protests known. The reasons are straightforward. The main beneficiaries of the changes are the wealthy. About £77 million will go to 120,000 couples where the husband earns more than £30,000 per annum. What sort of targeting is that? How can it be fair to start tax reforms with concessions to the rich, leaving the poor?

The proposals are especially advantageous to couples who derive income from investments, because there is scope for transfer of assets, making maximum use of the separate allowance which is worth about £75 a week to non-pensioner couples who are in a position to take advantage of it.

The other principal objection to the Government's proposals is that the changes do not represent truly independent taxation. It does not matter how the Government try to dress up the issue for presentational purposes; the wife's position is still bound up with that of her husband. It is not just a question of nuance. As the Minister made clear, the intention of the proposals is that the married couple's allowance should go automatically to the husband. The wife will have no automatic right to any excess allowance. It will be for the husband to allocate. The transfer applies only if the husband gives written notice to say so. The Opposition will try to amend the Bill to remove that indefensible anomaly.

Interestingly, when the European Communities Select Committee in the other place considered its response to the memorandum from the Commission to the Council of Ministers on income taxation and the treatment of men and women, it concluded that the aim of equal treatment was best served by a system of fully independent taxation. It is not clear whether that is the Government's view, and today's proposals are the first step in that direction, or whether the Government will content themselves with the concessions that have been made to the better-off. The latter seems to be more in line with present Government policy.

Clause 98 provides for separate taxation for husband and wife for capital gains purposes. The important, if obvious, point to make is that one must pay capital gains tax before one can benefit from the changes, and fewer than one in 100 taxpayers pays capital gains tax. I do not wish to trespass on tomorrow's debate, but in the context of disaggregation, it is clear that substantial sums will be gained by married couples who, from 1990, can each use their capital gains tax allowances of £5,000. The Government are not arranging the allowances so that the change is neutral in terms of the public purse. Although the beneficiaries are reasonably wealthy, even from a Conservative point of view, there should be—there would have been in the days of the old Conservative party—a case for neutrality.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said in the debate on clause 49, such decisions represent public expenditure that should more properly be focused on the Health Service, public sector housing, the social security system and the issues that matter to the many rather than to the already advantaged few. The Government have followed a twisted and rather shabby road to arrive at their present proposals. Impelled by social changes, outside even this Government's control, the Chancellor produced his famous Green Paper in 1986, cautiously advocating a partially transferable allowance. I have always suspected that the real thinking behind it was that the Government believed that it might reduce unemployment.

As it transpired, the Government made light of their Green Paper proposals in the 1987 general election campaign. They did not make light of the Labour party's proposals. They attacked the Labour party ruthlessly for supporting the principle for which the Minister is now trying to take credit. After the election, the Green Paper was put to one side and we were presented with something different—today's proposals.

The failure to provide a structure that is genuinely independent and the shameless further advantages given to the wealthy few make the proposals unacceptable to the Opposition and to many people, especially women, outside the House.

For those reasons, I urge the Committee to vote not against the principle in clause 31 but against the giveaway in clause 98.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): It is often said that jewels come in small packages. In this short clause, we have a long-awaited jewel. Despite the comments of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) about women outside the House and how they would view the proposals, women have been waiting for this for a long time and I have heard nothing but praise from outside the House and within it.

This is not just an important financial measure for some couples; it is an important social measure. It is the correction of a social injustice that has been ignored by Governments of all parties for far too long. I congratulate the Government on their courage in, despite the cost, finally putting right the injustice.

Clause 31 gives dignity and independence to a wife. There is no reason why a wife's income should be regarded as her husband's property when it is many years since we have regarded the wife herself as the husband's property. Furthermore, it recognises the role of the married woman as a person in her own right and it is long overdue. However, it is also just for the married man. Why should he be responsible for his wife's taxation and, particularly, for paying tax on his wife's income when that may exceed his own in these happily liberated days?

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I wholly agree with the tenor of the hon. Lady's speech, but why should the husband then be responsible for the allocation of the allowance?

Miss Widdecombe: I do not intend to address clause 32, because I am dealing strictly with clause 31. I have considerable sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman has said and have expressed that sympathy outside the Chamber. However, I am prepared to accept, pending a further consideration of the matter, that, if making that difference will delay the process by several years, I should prefer that we went ahead. However, I join the hon. Gentleman in hoping that this will be just the first step and not the final step and I hope that I have put his mind at rest. I shall keep to clause 31 because we can thrash out clause 32 in Committee. Clause 31 is social justice for both the man and the wife.

The hon. Gentleman made considerable play of the fact that the reforms benefit principally the better off. That may be so, but I need a great deal of convincing that the better-off woman is less entitled to her dignity and independence than the less well-off woman. Although the hon. Gentleman castigated the Government he did not come up with a system that would have allowed independent taxation for everybody and did not benefit the better off.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I hope that I made it clear that it would have been possible for the Government to adopt a position of fiscal neutrality in dealing with unearned income. I hope that I gave the House the impression that I would have endorsed that approach.

Miss Widdecombe: Unearned income, whether it belongs to the wife or the husband, is still an independent source of income and should be treated in exactly the same way as we are now treating earned income. The hon. Gentleman mentioned targeting, whereby one can introduce independent taxation in such a way that one does not create some benefits for the better-off, while creating substantial benefits for the less well-off. I shall address that point later because it is crucial.

8.15 pm

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: If the hon. Lady wishes to intervene on that point later, I shall be willing to give way to her then.

The elderly will benefit substantially from the measures. It is all very well to say that only the well-off elderly will benefit from the measures, but we are encouraging the elderly to be independent. We want to see our pensioners enjoy a reasonable standard of living. Surely it is not sensible to penalise them merely because they happen to be somewhat better off than other pensioners. If we introduce the measure and make incomes independent, it will benefit people across a wide range of incomes, but the largest benefit will be a social one.

I wish to deal with a benefit that has perhaps not been discussed so much. Let us take the case of a part-time working wife with a high-earning husband. There may be some difference between myself and Opposition Members about what constitutes high earning, but let us assume that the husband will pay a higher rate of tax if he adds on his wife's part-time earnings than he might if he had only his own earnings to take into account.

Under the present system of aggregation, even if the wife is earning only a modest part-time income, when it is aggregated with the husband's salary and taxed from £1 at the higher rate, the value to that couple of the wife's part-time income is severely reduced. In many cases, a husband and wife will conclude that it is simply not worth the wife's time to make the considerable effort to arrange to have the children looked after and to go out to work because the family will enjoy only a tiny proportion of what she receives.

That acts as a social disincentive to the working wife to have some financial independence. She may not wish to go out to work full time, despite the social pressures to do so. She may not wish to stay at home and bring up the family full time. She may want some independence and some income to call her own, yet there is a positive disincentive under the aggregation system. The new measure will benefit a certain type of wife who can work only part time and earn a modest wage and may not be well qualified. Once again, the clause remedies a considerable social injustice.

It is wrong that, as a society committed to the family, we should have tolerated for so long a situation that acts as a disincentive to marriage. However, one can well understand how two people, wishing to start a family, to take on responsibility for the expenses of that family, to provide that family with a home and to give their children the advantages that they want to give them, will say that, for financial reasons, it might be better not to marry. That decision is not taken just by very high earners. It is taken by those earning fairly modestly who reckon that, with an aggregation of incomes, perhaps in a couple of years' time, when their lot has improved, they will suddenly find themselves in the next tax bracket. The new proposal, together with the change in mortgage relief for unmarried couples, has acted as an incentive for marriage and is socially desirable.

The capital gains tax provisions are logical steps to take, but I understand why Opposition Members do not like them. If we are accepting independent taxation and if we are treating a wife's income as completely separate from the income of her husband, with the husband's income being completely separate from his wife's, we must be logical and look beyond the narrow range of earned income. If we do not, we shall create an anomaly whereby a woman is a person in her own right while she is earning but if she has any other income that becomes the property of her husband.

Any system of taxation that separates one set of income from another and allows only partial independence is perpetuating the injustices that women have suffered for the past 180 years and which they would have continued to suffer but for the courage of my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

On social grounds, never mind the cost to the Treasury, we have before us a long overdue measure. If it offers a financial benefit for the better-off, it benefits also the less well-off. It provides social justice straight across the scale. We have no ethos that states that individuals are less entitled to social justice as a reflection of their circumstances.

Ms. Mowlam: The hon. Lady has talked about those who are financially better-off benefiting as opposed to the less well-off. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said, we must consider tax changes in relation to national insurance contributions and benefit changes. If these factors are taken together, especially the benefit changes that are squeezing people with lower incomes, it is clear that many people are not benefiting. Many are faced with double jeopardy. That is why I disagreed with the hon. Lady's earlier comments.

The hon. Lady has spoken about the needs of women in part-time employment. Will she support my campaign to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider tax relief for workplace nurseries? If the Government are serious about getting women back to work, it is clear that that would be a positive step forwards.

Miss Widdecombe: The changes in benefit that the Government have introduced in a series of measures are geared to achieve the sort of targeting that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East said was desirable. That is gearing specifically to help those who are the least well off and who are least able to provide for themselves. The benefit changes, taken with the raising of benefit thresholds and the lowering of income tax rates, will certainly help those who are paying only the basic rate of tax. They will help also the many who have been taken out of the tax system. All these measures will benefit the less well off. I think that the Government have it right. I believe that their scale of social justice is right. It applies regardless of income.

Ms. Mowlam rose——

Miss Widdicombe: I shall respond to the second question raised by the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) before she asks a third. I would not wish to do her the injustice of forgetting her second question. I regret that I cannot support the hon. Lady's campaign for tax relief on workplace nurseries. At first sight it might appear to be an entirely reasonable request. If an employer is providing a workplace nursery, he is providing a benefit. To grant tax relief on top of that is to introduce a double benefit.

I do not wish to reduce child care by calling it a perk, but it is a benefit provided by an employer. Unlike a company car or a uniform, for example, it is a benefit that is solely for the employee's comfort while at work. Unless an employer cannot recruit without providing that benefit, he is not gaining a benefit. The benefit lies with the employee. I cannot see the justice, social or otherwise, of allowing women who have access to workplace nurseries to have the benefit of tax relief while their companions, their sisters—other women—do not have access to that benefit and have to make their own arrangements through playgroups or whatever.

Although I honour the principle behind the hon. Lady's campaign, I find it inconsistent with justice for all women. It would benefit some disproportionately while being completely out of kilter with the tax system, which provides that tax is paid on a benefit and relief is not gained on it. I cannot support the hon. Lady's argument. Am I right in understanding that she has a third question?

Ms. Mowlam: I did not have a third question. I merely wish to give an example to contradict the first of the hon. Lady's arguments. There are specific examples in my constituency of pensioners who in 1990 will have their income tax reduced and who will lose housing benefit as a result. In the end, they will be worse off. There are concrete examples that contradict the claim that the system will work to the benefit of pensioners and people on benefit. The same will hold for many single parents with children. I can give examples of that at a later stage to prove that the hon. Lady's claims do not match reality.

Secondly, I do not believe that the hon. Lady's argument holds on tax relief in terms of workplace nurseries. Tax relief could be extended to other nursery facilities. My campaign is merely a foot in the door. The reality is that many women who want to work take on low-paid work, including part-time jobs. It is not equal pay for equal value. My proposal would be one way of easing the conditions that now prevail.

Miss Widdecombe: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her third and fourth questions. I have no doubt that there will be a fifth and a sixth.

The hon. Lady is right when she says that women take on jobs that are low paid and then have difficulty in making the necessary nursery provision. But there are women in low-paid jobs who do not have any sort of nursery provision made available to them. The logic of the hon. Lady's position will soon be that everyone who works must have some provision made for the care of his or her children. I do not want to denigrate those who work and have a child. It is a major part of women's liberation this century that we have come to realise that that is a reasonable thing to do.

However, it is a decision of individual responsibility. The individual must decide. "Am I going to have a family? If I am, am I going to work? If I work, what will be the consequences? If I do not, what will the consequences be?" It is a matter of personal responsibility, and the state cannot pick up the tab for every individual's decision. If we are to encourage independence, independent decision-making and independent financial provision for women, they must have independent responsibility. They should not have a basic issue such as child care dealt with for them.

The hon. Member for Redcar claims that some pensioners will be worse off in 1990. I, too, have received representations on that subject. Pensioners who will be most worse off are those who already have capital assets to the fairly substantial tune of £8,000, or assets in a property in which neither they nor a dependant relative live. In those circumstances it cannot be said that we are hitting the least well-off pensioners. However, we are very much off the point. I do not know what this has to do with clause 31, which is directed to independent taxation for women.

Clause 31 is not merely a financial measure. It is one of the greatest pieces of social justice that we have seen in legislation for the past two decades.

Mr. Beith: The inclusion in the Finance Bill of the proposal for independent taxation for women is to be welcomed and is long overdue. I have criticised the Chancellor of the Exchequer for not taking the opportunities open to him in many areas because of considerable buoyant reveues, but he has taken the opportunity open to him in this area. However, I will argue that he might have acted slightly differently. It is right to place on record that he has done what women for many years believed should have been done.

It is perhaps right to call the proposals for women's taxation "social justice". However, if Conservative Members, like the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), claim the term "social justice", they should apply it rather more fully in the rest of the Budget than they have done so far. In almost all other respects, the Budget denies the most basic principles of social justice.

8.30 pm

The present system of the taxation of married couples cannot be defended. Its most obvious fault, which clause 31 will correct, is that it treats a married woman's income as if it were her husband's. It treats her discriminately, as if she were an unequal partner in the marriage. That would be ended by clause 31, and so it should be.

However, other problems arise from the present pratice involving women's taxation. The present married man's allowance is not only by its very title illustrative of a now challenged concept of equal partnership in marriage; it also represents a situation in which allowances go, in very large measure, to those who perhaps need them less than others. Primarily they go to two earner couples who represent less than one quarter of the population, but who receive 43 per cent. of the benefit of the allowances.

The Government's chosen solution has been to preserve the married man's allowance, but to change its name to a married couple's allowance. They have revealed that by the obvious fact that the allowance will still reside with the man until he takes the step voluntarily to transfer it to the woman. The Government have chosen to preserve the married man's allowance under a different name. That has the effect not merely of reducing the independence that should be given to the woman, thereby negating one of the main effects of the clause, but of preserving a form of benefit that is not particularly well targeted.

It is very difficult to argue that there should be a specific allowance for being a married couple. I believe that marriage is an excellent institution. I am strongly in favour of it and I have benefited greatly by being a party to it. However, I do not need specific tax allowances to induce me to join it. Conversely, I do not believe that the tax system should be rigged against marriage as it has been in a number of ways, not least in relation to mortgage tax relief, as the hon. Member for Maidstone explained.

There is little argument in logic or principle for a married man's or a married couple's allowance as such. The alternative solution for independent taxation would have been the ultimate abolition of the married man's allowance—or married couple's allowance, as it is to be known—with transitional protection and having two single non-transferable allowances. That would release resources that could be targeted on those most in need through cash benefit, particularly child benefit for those couples with children whose needs are greater. The Government should have taken that step.

If the Government are suggesting that using transitional provisions to protect the existing beneficiaries and allowing the effects of inflation over the years to complete the change is somehow an inappropriate way of proceeding, I remind them that that is what they are doing with the breadwinner wives. One of the anomalies of the present system is that where the wife earns but the husband does not, the couple receive 2·6 personal allowances—the married man's allowance plus the wife's allowance. However, that is not true the other way round. If the husband earns, but the wife does not, they receive only 1·6 personal allowances. That is illogical and not consistent with independent and equal treatment of married men and women. Clearly, breadwinner wives will lose through the 1990 changes.

Many wives are breadwinners because their husbands are unable to work, unemployed or disabled and there is obviously a case for transitional protection. The Government have granted that by effectively freezing the 2·6 personal allowances in cash terms until what is now the equivalent of that allowance becomes equal to the value of the married couple's allowance. The Government have built in a transitional protection of the kind that I have argued that they could introduce if they chose to abolish the married man's allowance. In other words, they have set a precedent for the procedure which I believe would be a better way to proceed towards independent taxation.

If independent taxation means anything, it must mean independent taxation of investment income as well as what is called earned income. That is one of the reasons why the change is expensive. It means that wealthy couples with considerable assets will be able to rearrange their affairs so as to derive a very considerable benefit. That leads me to ask why the Government have not taken some steps to create a forestalling provision to discourage or prevent people from simply rearranging assets to maximise benefits and transferring benefits between partners to benefit from the position.

The Government's answer is that it would be very complicated to make that provision. That is presumably why the official Opposition have not tabled an amendment to deal with the problem in that way. If it is not dealt with through the measures to prevent the transfer of investments from one partner to another, it appears that Labour Members are arguing about investment income —and certainly in relation to capital gains tax—and that they will have to vote against the whole proposal because of the benefit that it will confer on people who possess considerable assets. That is illogical. It is difficult to accept that, because some people will benefit a great deal, it is wrong to have independent taxation for investment income or capital gains tax.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not implying that that is the official Opposition's view. It is not.

Mr. Beith: I distinguished between investment income and capital gains tax because what I have described appeared not to be the position in relation to investment income but appeared to be the case for capital gains tax and therefore the reason why the official Opposition intend to vote against clause 98 involving the application of the same principle to capital gains tax.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way because I do not want there to be any misunderstanding about the official Opposition's attitude. If we are to support the principle of disaggregation, it must apply to earned and unearned income. The point that I made in an intervention earlier is that, were that to apply to unearned income, it should be applied in a fiscally neutral way. If it is done in any other way, it is, in effect, an item of public expenditure. We contend that where money can be put back into tax concessions, it should go to the poorest rather than to those who are significantly wealthier than average citizens.

Mr. Beith: That might be fiscally neutral but it is not neutral for the individuals concerned. It will mean treating parties to a marriage differently because they are married. It is a complete departure from the principle of independent taxation.

I understand why the Labour party wants to make that qualification and I understand the anxiety with which Labour Members viewed the investment income aspect. However, I am not willing to be dragged along that road. I do not accept that the proposals should not be accepted because they cannot be done in a fiscally neutral way. None of this can be achieved on a fiscally neutral basis. We have all accepted that the mere introduction of independent taxation in any form, for earned as well as unearned income, is not fiscally neutral. It costs money. The Chancellor happens to be able to afford to do some of these things in this Budget.

Obviously, Labour Members and Social and Liberal Democrats must judge this measure against others—for example, the way in which the Budget has piled benefits on the wealthy and penalties on those who are considerably disadvantaged. That makes this part of the Bill look particularly heavy and adds to the tilting of the Budget. The fact remains—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) appears to want to make an intervention. I would have given way to him, because he appeared to be saying, sotto voce—although the hon. Gentleman's version of sotto voce would fill the Albert hall—that I was trying to have it both ways, to have the penny and the bun. He was suggesting that I was trying to take a neutral stance. Far from it. That is what the Labour party is trying to do. It is trying to say that it is in favour of independent taxation, but, because it will benefit some people in large measure, it will not apply the principle logically and fully.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): As to the hon. Gentleman's point about whether or not fiscal neutrality could be achieved, in the context of capital gains and the split that we now have proposed of £5,000 each for men and women, surely if that were reduced to £3,000 for each individual, in terms of the likely uptake it would have gone some way to meeting the hon. Gentleman's point. It would also have encouraged men to transfer resources to their wives if they were geared up to using in full their £6,000 relief.

Mr. Beith: That could possibly be considered. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is arguing for a general reduction in the disallowed portion, or again, for a particular discrimination against married people. I do not understand how one can argue that allowances should be less for people simply because they are married.

I do not believe that marriage needs a large tax cushion; but I am against people being discriminated against because they are married and against people being invited to enter into a relationship other than marriage because that it is fiscally advantageous for them to do so. That is contrary to all the principles of independent taxation and public policy—which ought to be supportive of marriage. The Labour party is mistaken if it feels that it has to vote against such principles.

If the introduction of any element of independent taxation was difficult because the revenue to the Government was so small, that might be a different matter, but that is not the situation. The Government could have introduced fully fledged independent taxation by the route that I suggested—targeting more help on people receiving child benefit. I hope and believe that I have the support of Labour Members at least in respect of that issue.

The Government could have done many other things to make the Budget fairer, while still keeping within the revenue and resources available to them. The Opposition should not oppose the logical extension of independent taxation into the area of capital taxation. I shall argue later that there are other ways in which the capital taxation system could do more to distribute capital and achieve greater social justice. However, we should not attempt to do that by denying the principle of independent taxation.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I am grateful for this opportunity to take part in the debate on clause 31, although I feel that I am in a sense guilty of tokenism before I even start, surrounded as I am—the only male Member on the Government Back Benches—by Tory ladies. Nevertheless, I shall press on.

The Government's decision to end the system of taxation which has blatantly discriminated against married women must be widely welcomed by almost everyone. Indeed, as a relatively new Member of the House, I am astonished that this testimonial to the values and customs of a by gone age has lasted so long. Perhaps within the House it has increasingly been seen as an intolerable measure, because a larger number of the younger male Members are married to professional women who pursue careers which in the past have more usually been associated with men. Whatever the reason, the Government are to be congratulated, not only on making the necessary reform, but on creating the economic strength and success required to allow such costly reforms to be implemented. It is a reform that will cost about £1 billion.

In preparing for the Committee stage of the Bill I found myself flicking through the Income Tax Act 1918, where-in I noticed that "an incapacitated person" means "any infant, married woman, lunatic, idiot or insane person."

It is time our tax laws recognised that things have moved on and that the present archaic system has become a fiscal embarrassment.

8.45 pm

Some hon. Members have tonight criticised this reform on the grounds that it grants an extra tax advantage to be enjoyed by all who are married, regardless of their income. I shall deal with that, but even if it were true—which it is not—I would still support the reform. It is right that society should recognise and support the institution of marriage through its financial and fiscal regulations. For far too long the dice have been loaded against those wishing to get married, and in favour of those wanting to cohabit. How often have we heard people getting married declare that they will be much worse off materially as a result, or making it clear that they "cannot afford" to get married? The Budget makes major progress in eradicating this injustice and supporting the structure of marriage itself.

Ms. Mowlam: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's arguments on marriage and the Bill. Can he explain why, in the Committee on the poll tax Bill, he supported joint and several liability for cohabitees?

Mr. Mitchell: The two are not anomalous, but it would probably be better, Mr. Walker, if I did not try your patience by going down that route and talking about the community charge.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Many of my constituents find it obnoxious that two unmarried people living together can enjoy double mortgage relief, but that a married couple cannot. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is wholly wrong?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has made an excellent point in her usual graceful and cogent manner.

Under the new arrangements stemming from this clause, it is not only well-off married couples who will benefit. The Treasury calculates that 75 per cent. of the 1990-91 cost will go to basic rate taxpayers or indeed to those who pay no tax at all. That is an important statistic. In particular, the position of thousands of elderly people will significantly improve. Under the new arrangements, that portion of the state pension which a man receives because he is married will be treated as if it was his wife's income. This will have a wholly welcome effect on the level of tax paid by old folk. According to the Inland Revenue, 900,000 women aged over 65 will benefit, and more than 1·5 million married women of all ages will pay less tax.

It is particularly interesting to note that of those 1·5 million women who will pay less tax, more than 1·2 million earn less than £5,000 per year.

Under the proposals, many elderly married women will, for the first time, have an age-related personal allowance, and 160,000 elderly couples will be taken out of tax entirely. In addition, as I understand the effect of that change, since a wife's income will no longer be added to her husband's for the purpose of applying the income limit for age allowance, approximately 130,000 elderly men on modest incomes will qualify for age allowance under the new system. I shall be grateful for my right hon. Friend's assurance on that point.

I am genuinely astonished that so little public attention has focused on the dramatic effect that this three-line clause will have on so many elderly and less well-off people. Quite apart from its effect on married women, 500,000 husbands will also pay less tax. It is clearly absolutely right also that those who are married and have savings should benefit from the provisions of the clause because of the independent taxation of investment income. If any Opposition Members believe that that will benefit only the rich, they are mistaken. The provision will be of great benefit to elderly people in particular, many of whom will now gain from the change. The system has hitherto penalised very low savings levels.

Because of the effects of Conservative policies of spreading ownership widely throughout society, and in particular of the right-to-buy provisions, we are becoming what one distinguished economic commentator writing in The Independent described as "a nation of inheritors." That is one principal reason, in my view, why it is no longer acceptable to separate taxation of earnings while treating all other income as though it belonged to a husband. Changes in the pattern of ownership and savings over the past few years have made that very clear.

As a result of this clause a number of new things will happen after 1990-91. Husbands and wives will be taxed independently on all their income. Married women will become taxpayers in their own right, giving them the privacy to which they are entitled and which is long overdue. A significant benefit will accrue to elderly married couples in larger personal and married allowances for package payers aged between 65 and 79 or those aged 80 and over. For the first time, elderly married women will qualify for age allowance in their own right.

Finally, the Government have given some modest but important support to the institution of marriage itself. This, too, will be widely welcomed, not only in this Committee, but in the country.

Mr. Wigley: First, let me welcome the change that the Government have made in the marriage allowance. I have written about it to successive Chancellors, Chief Secretaries and other Treasury officials, because I have had the invidious task of doing my wife's accounts for several years. It is bad enough doing the accounts of a professional musician a year or two behind schedule and in Welsh, but doing it in a way that balances her interests and mine in a fair manner is particularly difficult. I am therefore glad to support the change—for all the wrong reasons.

Mr. Morgan: Do not harp on about it.

Mr. Wigley: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall not.

I welcome the principle, and many of the details that accompany it. I realise that it is a far-reaching package. I cannot see, however, why the married man's allowance could not have been split 50:50, making it neutral initially, with any opting to be done from that base. The Minister shakes his head, but that would have been a practical starting point, which would have taken away some of the misgivings of those who in other respects welcome the change wholeheartedly, both here and outside the House. Nevertheless, perhaps it can be considered in the future. I also hope that the gamut of allowances will work in a neutral manner—socially neutral as well as neutral in their treatment of husbands and wives—to give us the most acceptable package.

I intervened a moment ago to make a point about capital gains. My point was that the Government are accepting a drop from £6,000 to £5,000, albeit £5,000 for each couple. I should have thought that, unless the drop is to £3,000 or £3,500, an immediate adjustment—as was hinted by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith)—must be undertaken in people's finances to minimise that. Such an adjustment would be expensive for the Treasury, and the money given away—as Labour Front-Bench spokesman have suggested—could be used for other purposes.

The Government have been open to criticism on other parts of the Budget, and I felt that this move was unnecessary. I welcome the principle, but a limited number of people will benefit from the shared capital gains. Many pensioners have saved capital sums because they have no pension from employment, and for them this is a significant but limited benefit. I do not see why there could not have been a bigger giveaway.

I am not clear on one point, perhaps because I have not read enough of the detail of the Bill. We are told that the husband and wife will be assessed independently and be responsible for their own income tax. Am I to take it that there is to be a complete ending of joint and several liability for the payments? I am thinking particularly of circumstances in which one partner, or both, are self-employed, so that no pay-as-you-earn system is in operation. If one partner is not paying, the other may be taken to court. I should be more than happy to give way if the Minister wishes to intervene on that important point, but perhaps he would prefer to comment later. We must be clear on that matter if we are to have a workable package that is genuinely non-sexist.

We also need provision to ensure that there is no likelihood of a man or woman being charged when he or she may not know the partner's financial position and be landed with the bill. This could be a minefield, and I should be grateful for some clarification.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I welcome clause 31, and I particularly welcome the gradual acceptance of its importance by the Opposition. I noticed, and remarked on it at the time of the Budget, that neither Opposition spokesman—there could conceivably have been an invisible third party as well—even bothered to comment on this extraordinarily large change. That was very upsetting, and I am delighted that Opposition hon. Ladies must have done considerable work between then and now to ensure that today's warm welcome was spontaneous, even if rather late in the day.

Mr. Chris Smith: Clearly, the hon. Lady either was not present in the House or has not read Hansard's account of the Budget debate on the Thursday evening. Speaking from the Opposition Front Bench, I gave a warm welcome to the principle of independent taxation, and spent a considerable time dealing in detail with the Government's proposals.

Miss Nicholson: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I was referring to the first speakers from the Opposition Front Bench, who in their immediate response to the Budget did not even bother to pick up that point. I picked it up, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman responded. However, I found it very distressing.

This is a remarkable and unique change. It will never happen again. It is extraordinary to think that married women in the United Kingdom have never really been treated fairly since the days of Julius Caesar. I say that not entirely jokingly. When Caesar wrote about what a grey and rainy island this was, he added that the British were an extraordinary race, because they treated their women in law on the same level as men. Alack, alas! Roman law then took over, and women have not seen the light of day until the present Conservative Government.

Mr. Wigley rose——

Miss Nicholson: It is different in Wales.

Mr. Wigley: The basis of that British law was the Welsh law which was coded by Hywel Dda. That gave equal status, and assets were distributed even-handedly. Some of us in Wales are looking to the day when we can reintroduce that system.

Miss Nicholson: In that case, let me say how sorry I am that civis Romana sum!

Hon. Members will recall the pre-eminence of city widows even in mediaeval days. They were the only women in the United Kingdom who were allowed to inherit and to deal. If unmarried, a woman was the belonging of her father; she did not exist in law. When she married, she was the belonging of her husband and certainly did not exist in economic law. If she did not marry and her father died, again she apparently did not exist in law. That explains why, in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" the Wife of Bath was such a popular lady; she had cash to play with. That is why, in Pepys's diaries, the city widows figure so largely in his dreams.

I do not raise those points entirely jokingly. Hon. Members who are gentlemen will not realise the degradation of begging for money. It is a beastly thing to have to do. So many married women over so many generations have been reduced to having to ask their husbands for small sums of money for housekeeping. That is a most degrading and beastly thing for married women to have to do. Real freedom is economic freedom. Freedom is just a word unless one has the money to buy.

Ms. Mowlam: As usual, I agree with some of the hon. Lady's points. However, her statements are based on the premise that equality has been reached under the present Government, and that the historical examples which she gave have now changed. She knows as well as I do that women do not have equality at work, in education, in the professions or in the Civil Service—as we heard this afternoon—or on the streets at night. We do not have equality, and we should get away from the sham and the facade that the hon. Lady is putting forward, as it clearly is not true.

Miss Nicholson: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her intervention. I am very aware of that problem and I shall move on to it in a moment.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I wonder whether the hon. Lady's feelings about women extend to the unemployed in the same way.

Miss Nicholson: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that a lot of women are unemployed? However, I do not think that clause 31 deals with unemployment. Although it is tempting to go down that path, I shall not allow myself to be tempted by the hon. Gentleman at the moment.

May I remind hon. Gentlemen that, as hon. Ladies already know, the problems of identity for women are not yet over. It is not always easy for a woman to be recognised on the same level as a man in any walk of life. Indeed, last week I received a letter from the Prime Minister's Office addressed to "Emma Nicholson Esq MP". The week before, when I was at Lancaster house, I asked an attendant where I could wait out of the rain while my husband parked the car. He replied, "I should wait for your husband over there if I were you, sir." I did not realise that entering the House of Commons gave one size 14 feet and made one grow a moustache. But I say most seriously that it is very difficult for women to be treated in a professional and proper manner, even in this hallowed place.

I welcome most strongly the Minister's tremendous step forward for womankind in giving married women a genuine identity in fiscal matters. The women of the Conservative party have long been seeking that identity. As far back as 1979, a report from the Conservative women's national committee urged the incoming Government—we knew that we would win—to establish independent taxation for married women. It said that all the difficulties that I have mentioned and that have been stated by other right hon. and hon. Members were true, and urged the Government to do something about it.

It was to the credit of the Conservative Government that despite all the talk from previous Labour Governments, and despite the tremendous Socialist ideal to favour married women as equals—I do not think that it is very good of them to favour married women as equals; the Labour party should treat married women as equals perhaps in organisations such as the Trades Union Congress which has very few women on its platform—the Conservative Government have taken up the challenge, and I cannot say how glad I am that they have done so.

When I was Conservative party vice-chairman with special responsibility for women, I launched a survey in response to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals in the previous Budget for the transferable personal allowance. My postbag was massive. Hundreds of letters poured in from women of all parties, saying how enormously unhappy they were with the present system and how much they wanted it changed. I sent out the survey to 50,000 women. It was published in The Sunday Times which considered the transformation of taxation for married women to be important. It was also published by an entirely different style of publication—Cosmopolitan, which appeals to much younger, single working women —and in a number of other papers, particular Conservative Newsline.

There was a massive response—98 per cent. of all women questioned said that the tax system had to be changed, and 78 per cent. favoured personal transferable allowances which did not see the light of day because it was not possible to get a consensus among women in the United Kingdom. I was very sorry about that because I recognised the comments that my right hon. and hon. Friends made earlier on the importance of not discriminating against marriage. I believe that the state should be non-judgmental when it looks at the lives of its citizens, and that it should not be the Ayatollah Khomeini telling us that we should be swathed in black or living in any particular way. If the state is to be non-discriminatory, it should not discriminate against marriage. It is enormously unfair that in recent years the state has discriminated against married people.

I favoured the personal transferable allowance, which would have helped the non-working married woman. Far be it from me to try to guide women back to the sink. Let us have freedom of choice to go out to work or to stay at home, but real freedom is economic freedom. It is very difficult for the married, non-working woman to be truly free. The personal transferable allowance would have been of immense help. However, there is now the important principle, which I hope will soon be enshrined in law, that for tax purposes women are to be treated independently. It is a remarkable move forward. Nevertheless, I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to consider most carefully the married person's allowance. I cannot accept that in perpetuity the married person's allowance should go as of right immediately to the man.

The Chairman: Order. That matter is dealt with elsewhere in the Bill. I do not think that we ought to trespass on the responsibilities of another Committee.

Miss Nicholson: I apologise, but this matter has been debated——

The Chairman: Order. We are debating clauses 31 and 98. Personal allowances are covered by clause 32. That is not a matter for a Committee of the whole House.

Miss Nicholson: The matter was discussed extensively by other hon. Members and that is why I have referred to it, but in view of your ruling, Mr. Walker, I shall not trespass on clause 32. However, I believe that it would be right and proper for my right hon. Friend the Minister to consider that point and, if I am allowed to trespass for a moment longer, to accept it in principle, even if it is too expensive now to put it right. The principle ought to be accepted that the married person's allowance should go to the highest earner.

Once again, I thank the Government, Treasury Ministers and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for responding to the needs of women by at last giving them equal treatment.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): All hon. Members agree that there should be independent taxation. I support also the right of privacy in tax matters for women. However, the Opposition have two major criticisms of the Government's proposals. First, the proposals are half-baked. They do not provide true, independent taxation; they provide a mixture of independent and joint taxation. Secondly, these measures, like so many other Government measures, will help wealthy couples but they will provide limited help to families at the bottom end of the income scale.

The half-baked nature of the measures is referred to in the report on the Budget that was published by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. One of the Committee's advisers described the reform as more cautious than had been expected and said:

> "It effectively retains the married allowance, thus favouring households of two married people over those of two single people. It provides for the married couple's allowance to be transferred from husband to wife, but favours the husband by awarding it to him in the first instance."

The hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) said that she hoped that the measure would be a step on the road towards full independent taxation, but in evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, answering a question that I put to him about whether 1990 was a staging post, said:

> "No, I see 1990 as a satisfactory solution to the problem."

That seems to show that the partial nature of the reform is likely to be with us for some time.

[Ms. Joyce Quin]

Apparently, a full move to independent taxation was ruled out because it was considered too complicated and would have involved a large increase in staff dealing with taxation matters. Further, it was considered to be too expensive, although no details were given to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee about how much would be involved. Suspicion remained that the Government had gone only halfway because it would have cost too much to have a truly equitable system. Even if it was too expensive, I do not understand why the Government could not have given a long-term commitment to completely independent taxation. Perhaps the Minister will make such a commitment tonight.

There is still a great deal of confusion about whether married people will be treated as individuals or as a household with their incomes being added together. Mortgage tax relief has been mentioned, but there are many other examples that show that confusion exists. Perhaps an independent commission is needed to sort out the position and to ensure that in future a completely coherent, logical approach is applied to the taxation of married couples and to the law relating to matrimonial property.

In the short term, it does not appear that such a position will be reached. Regrettably, we now have a halfway house, which is not something that we favour in the long term.

Miss Widdecombe: Despite the hon. Lady's comments about a halfway house on the equality of the taxation system between single and married households, does she agree that at a stroke the changes have provided a satisfactory solution to the problem of subordination of women within marriage? By taking on board earned as well as unearned income they ensured that financially there is no room for the subjugation of women within marriage.

Ms. Quin: I agree that they were an important step but I do not think that they are a solution to the problem. I hope that the hon. Lady will try to persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to regard 1990 not as a solution but as a staging post.

My second criticism is that the measures that the Government have taken on the taxation of married couples, allied to the other Budget measures, simply disproportionately help already wealthy couples, whereas those on low incomes will see little advantage.

Whatever attitude is taken to the indexation of capital and investment income, it will benefit wealthier couples more than those at the bottom of the income scale. There is a great deal of worry that a Government who said that they wanted to tackle some of the tax breaks in the system will be encouraging wealthy couples to minimise tax liability by transferring assets between themselves. I do not know whether the Government are considering extra anti-avoidance measures to ensure that that does not happen, but if they are not they should be.

I would have been happier about the steps that the Government are taking in the direction of independent taxation if they had been part of the Budget that sought to redress the growing gap between rich and poor—for example, if those measures had been allied to measures such as an increase in child benefit, which, given the revenues at the Government's disposal, could easily have been done. Child benefit could have been doubled for the cost of the special allowance for married couples. Unfortunately, the reforms take place against a background of reduced housing benefit and the social security changes which have created great hardship. Moreover, maternity benefits were reduced last year. That affects families on low incomes in particular.

A truly independent taxation regime can bring great benefits, but unless it is accompanied by measures that help couples and families on low incomes, the benefits of independent taxation will not be widely felt and its effects will be selective. We need additional measures to bring much-needed financial relief to families and couples who are the worst off in the land.

Ms. Mowlam: I hope that it will be in order for me to pick up two points that were made earlier and which are important to this debate.

The hon. Members for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), and for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) talked about independence for women. We were told that independence is related to economic freedom and that it is important for pensioners to be independent. I do not see how they can argue that line when television licences and electricity prices are going up. We cannot speak of independence for women or pensioners because their economic freedom is not taken into account. We are told that about 900,000 pensioners will benefit from the proposed changes, but there are 11 million pensioners. That means that 10 million will not benefit. Without some form of economic freedom, the only freedom that those people have is the freedom to sit in front of an electric fire with one bar on and to decide whether they can afford to watch telly tonight. That is not the independence to which hon. Members are referring.

Conservative Members have accused us of not being logical. It is therefore incumbent on the Government, if they maintain that this is a reform and that it does not discriminate against the institution of marriage—that is fine, if it is non-discriminatory—to be logical about poll tax. If joint and several liability affects marriage and cohabitees, I should like it transferred to this Bill.

The Minister referred often to "hon. Gentlemen", which seemed to be a psychological slip. He said that he is sweeping away anachronisms that date from 1805. I consider that to be an overstatement, to put it delicately. On Second Reading, I described the reform as a fraud and a sham, and I do not retract that statement in so far as it relates to the majority of women. This is a breakthrough —I accept what has been said, primarily by hon. Ladies, about that—but to go into hyperbole is to go too far.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Does the hon. Lady agree that, with the coming computerisation of the income tax system, if we had not made the programming change now there would have been a major problem? This is therefore an honest breakthrough to identify women as tax units. If we do not do that, women will for ever be invisible to the system.

Ms. Mowlam: It is not a question of satisfaction for computers and the tax system. Nor was that the commitment that the Chancellor led us to believe underlay his views when he introduced the change. If it was a case of making things easy for computers, those papers which described the Chancellor as a feminist ought to withdraw and describe him instead as a technocrat, for his interest is in computers rather than women.

My point is that this reform—which is a step forward—benefits some women but not the majority. In fact, the majority of women will see no change. They will notice no difference when the change is introduced in 1990. Let us look at the argument that has been advanced by Conservative Members as to why the change will be an advantage. They said it is an advantage for married women because it means they can make their own tax returns and get their own tax rebates on earned and unearned income. Therefore, it gives some legal independence and financial privacy.

At first glance, I accept that as a plus for many women. When we debated that on Second Reading, the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West also accepted that that was a plus. However, we have to look at how the married couple's allowance will work. The husband will be able to transfer any part of the unused portion of the married couple's allowance to his wife. To do so will involve paperwork and exchange of information and take away the supposed privacy and independence that will have been given to women by the introduction of the reform. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said, it can only be transferred to a woman in writing. Is that an indication of equality? Is that an indication of the sort of change in the position of women that we hoped for? It means that it is not an automatic right for women. That has to be borne in mind.

Miss Nicholson: Will the hon. Lady admit that it is a significant step to give both the woman and man in marriage an individual personal allowance? I thank the hon. Lady for referring to my constituency correctly. It is often turned back to front. The clotted cream on the top of the cake is the oddity, the married person's allowance, which many of us would like to see handled in the same equal manner as the joint single person's allowances will now be handled. It is the establishment of the single person's allowance for the married woman that is the technical, practical and freedom breakthrough.

Ms. Mowlam: To continue the hon. Lady's analogy, the clotted cream has seeped so far down that the married couple's allowance has made the whole thing a stodge—and so unrealistic that the position of women is not necessarily improved.

I accept the hon. Lady's first statement, that it is a step in the right direction. However, because of the way in which the married couple's allowance will work, it takes that independence from women. For any unused portion to be transferred from the man to the woman, the woman will have to talk about her income. Therefore, all this talk about financial independence and privacy at last is not the case. It is not an automatic right and we must acknowledge that.

Miss Nicholson: Does the hon. Lady agree that the privacy element is brought in by the independent taxation, particularly of savings and investments? Does she also agree that the cry that it is only the rich who will benefit totally disregards the many thousands of women who have small savings, which at the moment are taxed at their husband's income level? The aggregation of the married people's income is the real abomination and setting those two things apart gives real privacy to many thousands of women.

Ms. Mowlam: I accept part of what the hon. Lady has said. However, as I said before, it is not an automatic right. The husband can go ahead, plan his investments and take part in the BES shares that we heard about earlier. The wife cannot do that without some reference to the couple together. I am not willing to go as far as the hon. Lady in saying that it is a monumental change. I accept that it is a positive step in the right direction, but we should not kid ourselves that the hyperbole that we heard from the Minister is the reality.

Miss Widdecombe: Can we please define the concept of automatic right?

Ms. Mowlam: Yes.

Miss Widdecombe: I thank the hon. Lady for her agreement. We all have rights. Women have a right to work. Some women may find that, because of their personal circumstances, they cannot exercise that right. We all have a right to vote. Some women may decide that they will not use that right or find, through slip-ups, that it has been taken from them. We all have a right to marry. Some women will not choose to exercise that option. We have a right to independent taxation. If we decide to exercise the transfer option and, in doing so, lose a little privacy, that does not affect the basic right to independent taxation if we choose to exercise it. Will the hon. Lady concede that this is a major piece of social legislation giving us basic rights?

Ms. Mowlam: I wish that the hon. Lady would notice the distinction which I make. I acknowledge that this is a positive step forward. I have not denied that, either on Second Reading or in Committee. I am fighting this corner because I do not want the fantasy which we have heard from the Financial Secretary portrayed as reality. The hon. Lady says that distinguishing between independent taxation and the married couple's allowance does not change the reality, but it does change it because the allowance is given to the man.

If the allowance were given to either partner, as the Equal Opportunities Commission asked, the EOC and I—and I am sure the Members for Torridge and Devon, West and for Maidstone—would be happier, but it was not. It is not an automatic right. It does not give equality. That cannot be ignored. I should like to continue this discussion, but I am afraid that you, Mr. Walker, will not allow it.

The Chairman: Order. I think that we have heard far too much. I remind the Committee that we are dealing with clauses 31 and 98. Clause 98 deals entirely with capital gains tax. Clause 31 states:

> "Section 279 of the Taxes Act 1988 (which treats the income of a woman living with her husband as his income for income tax purposes) shall not have effect for the year 1990-91 or any subsequent year of assessment."

I find it difficult to understand what that has to do with allowances. I draw the Committee's attention to the fact that these allowances are covered elsewhere in the Bill. They will be dealt with by another Committee, and this Committee should not trespass upon those considerations.

Ms. Mowlam: Thank you for that guidance, Mr. Walker. I was merely responding to points raised by Conservative Members.

I should like to take the exact point that you made, Mr. Walker, and refer to the nature of the married couple's allowance. As the hon. Member for Maidstone will have to acknowledge, this is another point that does not result in equality between men and women. The wife starts paying taxes above earnings of £2,600 while the man starts at earnings above £4,900. Because of the allowance, the amount that the man gets in his pay packet will vary between £7 a week and £41 a week, depending on his wage. Again, there is a clear differential which benefits the man. That is the effect of the clause. One cannot begin to argue that it treats men and women equally.

I acknowledge that the clause benefits retired people, many of whom are women. As the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) said, we are talking about 900,000 people. There are 11 million retired people. A small minority, knocking on 1 million, will benefit, but 10 million pensioners will not necessarily gain from this legislation, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East pointed out.

I am pleased that certain people with investments will benefit, and I do not want to penalise them. We should be clear that those who will benefit are not pensioners as a whole, but a small group. Many of those pensioners will be further penalised by the social security legislation. Unless we look at that jigsaw as a whole, we cannot see the total impact of the Bill.

I shall draw my remarks to a close. As I said on Second Reading, this clause is a fraud and a sham. I acknowledge that it is a step forward.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Does the hon. Lady agree that the principle of independent taxation is being established for the very first time in this Finance Bill?

9.30 pm

Ms. Mowlam: I shall be pleased when the principle manifests itself in reality. The hon. Member for Maidstone talked a great deal about principle—about independence and choice—but unless that principle is backed by economic independence and economic freedom it is meaningless. Let us agree the principle—it is easy and cheap to agree principles—but let us also ensure that the reality, the practice and the process accord with it. Under the Bill, that will not necessarily happen. If we are honest with each other, we must acknowledge that the provisions abolish the married man's allowance only to introduce it under another name.

The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West asked me how the povisions will benefit some people more than others. Many Conservative Members have doubted that assertion. Let me give two examples to support my case. A couple with investments of £10,000 will save an additional £41 a week when the provision is introduced in 1990. A single mother, with two children under the age of 11, will lose £11·69 per week overall under the Bill. Her £1·23 tax cut will not make up for the loss of child benefit and housing benefit, despite increases in family credit. Overall, she will be worse off as a direct result of the changes. We must take both those examples into account if we are to understand the exact meaning of the Bill. I acknowledge that the clause is a step in the right direction, but do not let us listen any more to Conservative Members' hyperbole.

Mr. Morgan: We are discussing the abolition of disaggregation in clause 31 and the parallel provision for equality of treatment of men and women for capital gains purposes in clause 98. So far, two aspects of the matter have not been covered. First, we have not dealt with targeting. Secondly, we have not yet said that when Chancellors introduce provisions intended to benefit a major social group—in this case women—they should ask the members of that group what they regard as their priority.

Last month the Government introduced social security and housing benefit changes, which caused them great difficulties. Those changes were based on the principle, enunciated several thousand times by Conservative Members, that they gave help where it was most needed. It was argued that if public expenditure was to be reorganised we should target assistance to those who needed it most, in circumstances where they needed it most. There is complete dissonance between that principle, enunciated in our debates on the social security and housing benefit changes, and the provision that we are debating.

The Chancellor is attempting to make his mark. He wants to appear in the history books and make his mark in the footnotes. Perhaps it will be among the Chancellors whose political ambitions were terminated by the Brian Walden interview with the Prime Minister at the weekend. If he can do nothing else and rise no further in the political hierarchy, he wants it said of him that he introduced independent and equal taxation for women which had not been in operation since the time of Julius Caesar.

How can the provision, which is completely untargeted, be squared with the housing benefit and social security changes that were introduced last month? We all know from our constituency surgeries and mailbags that independent and equal taxation is not one of women's main priorities. It may be one of the Chancellor's main priorities in his attempts to gain a place in the history books, but it is not what women want. Had women been asked, "What are your main priorities?", I am sure that they would have presented independent and equal taxation as a long-term aim—there is no question but that it is needed—but they would have argued that far more important things needed to be done if there was public money to be spent.

Miss Emma Nicholson: The hon. Gentleman, because he is not a woman, perhaps fails to realise how deeply this issue has troubled married and unmarried women for so long, as the postbags of the Treasury and of people such as myself have shown.

The Sunday Times reporter was appalled at what came out of the questionnaire that was printed. This has been one of the foremost priorities for women, because it is of crucial importance.

Mr. Morgan: I am sure that the hon. Lady is correct in saying that women cannot abide injustice as between themselves and men. We all appreciate that very strongly. In considering what women would most want from this year's Budget, however, my surgery experience and my mailbag suggest that there is more concern about what has happened to widows' pensions, for example. A 42-year-old widow bringing up a daughter has written to me to say that she will lose £56·80 per week when her daughter leaves full-time education this summer. This widow is in part-time work, but she simply does not know what she will do. The need to increase child benefit has already been stressed, as has the impact of poll tax on women through joint and several liability.

Miss Nicholson: Without wishing to be discourteous, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman's constituents who are women do not ask him to do anything about women and tax because the Labour Government failed so significantly to do anything whatever about the problem.

Mr. Morgan: In my closing remarks—I trust that the hon. Lady will be able to restrain herself and not intervene again—I wish to refer to the unequal treatment of people who have saved to provide for old age, compared with those who have small occupational pensions. The situation has been made far worse by the changes in housing benefit. It is women, particularly, who miss out on company pensions or small occupational pensions from the Post Office, British Rail or whatever, if they have a career break to bring up children and thus tend to depend on savings rather than on a pension. They are far worse off as a result of the Government's changes in housing benefit.

Had women been asked in what ways they would like additional public expenditure to be made available to them, equality would have been put down as a long-term goal, but my correspondence and surgery experience suggest that they would have given far higher priority to other areas such as child benefit in terms of what should be achieved by this year's Budget. The Chancellor has made no attempt to consult women about what they actually want.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Opposition have no quarrel with the principle of clause 31 and independent taxation for a man and his wife. We warmly welcome the principle of disaggregation. That is why I shall advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to accept clause 31. We have doubts about clause 98. They have been aired in the debate and I shall return to them later.

As we stated in the election campaign, we believe that it is offensive that a wife should be regarded for taxation purposes effectively as a chattel of her husband and we warmly welcome the removal of that principle from our income tax system.

The present system is not just offensive—it is a muddle and a mess, as the Institute for Fiscal Studies clearly identified when it said that the system was "a mess. It provides an incentive to some to marry and a deterrent to others. For some purposes it presumes that the wife is wholly dependent on her husband, while for other purposes it rests on a presumption that husband and wife form an economic unit."

With a system that deals in such different ways with the same couple in the same marriage it is clearly a benefit to try to sort out the anomalies.

The report from the Institute for Fiscal Studies also reveals some of the problems that the Government are setting for themselves and for married couples with their intended replacement of the present system. That is where our principal concern lies.

My hon. Friend the Members for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) said that we do not believe that the system after 1990 will give true independence to married women. It will not do that, especially because of the institution of the married couple's allowance—the married man's allowance by another name—which will go in the first instance to the man; only on his decision and in limited circumstances will it be transferable to the woman. That is not true independence. It is certainly not true independence and economic freedom for women. That is our principal objection to the structure with which the Government wish to replace the present system.

We wish that the Government had listened to the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) who, on 31 March, joined the Equal Opportunities Commission in seeking to allow husbands and wives to choose who should have the allowance. We agree entirely with that principle and we hope to pursue it in greater detail in Committee. We believe that the administrative difficulties that the Government say would attend such a principle can be overcome and are worth overcoming.

The Opposition's second anxiety is that the Government's proposals will not replace a judgmental system with a non-judgmental system. The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West said that the Government are removing discrimination against marriage. To some extent they are, but they are replacing it with a system that will discriminate in favour of marriage. That is not non-judgmental. It may be something which the Government wish to enshrine as part of public policy. The Chancellor likes the idea of marriage—he has had two of them. We should be clear that the Government intend to create a system that will discriminate in favour of marriage.

Our third principal objection to the proposals is that they will benefit primarily the better-off. The inclusion of unearned income within the allowance system and the principle of disaggregation will benefit people with large unearned incomes. Of course many pensioners will benefit, but, as some of my hon. Friends said, many more pensioners will not benefit at all. A group that will benefit is married couples who currently make the wife's earnings election. The disaggregation principle will be achieved without the loss of the married man's allowance, which is lost at present. People who elect for the wife's earnings system are overwhelmingly those in the high joint earnings bracket.

Another group that will benefit especially is married couples where the wife has earned or unearned income in excess of the personal allowance and where aggregation of that income with the husband's income would push the couple into a higher rate band. Disaggregation would push them back into the lower rate band and they would benefit considerably from the Government's proposals.

The principal beneficiaries of the Government's new scheme will be people on more than average incomes. A small group of women may lose under the Government's proposals and will require transitional protection. That group comprises wives who are the main breadwinners in the household. The example frequently quoted in this respect is that of an unemployed steelworker whose wife is a teacher. Those women may well lose as a result of the Government's proposals, unless transitional protection is afforded.

9.45 pm

One other anomaly will result. It has been little noticed, but it is worth referring to briefly. The Government's new system will almost certainly encourage the removal of a considerable amount of savings funds from building society accounts. We should perhaps ask the Government whether the building society movement has been consulted about their proposals. When the husband is a basic rate taxpayer, there is at present no disadvantage in his non-working wife placing her savings in a building society account. However, when she can use her own tax allowance, it would be a waste to leave funds in an account from which tax is deducted at source.

It would be prudent, therefore, in such circumstances, for the wife to remove her funds from the building society account and to opt for either National Savings or perhaps an offshore account paying gross interest. In those circumstances, building society accounts are likely to suffer and I hope that the Government have had discussions with the building society movement about the effect of the proposed changes.

There are a number of problems with the Government's proposed scheme. We have no quarrel with their desire to scrap the present system. They could have gone much further. They could have done something sensible about child benefit and put it up to a decent level, as we have been arguing for many years. They could have tackled the absurd measure that treats the provision of workplace nursery places as a taxable benefit, as we have been arguing for over many years. Both those measures would have greatly benefited the position of women within the tax and benefit system.

The Government have not taken that route. They have taken the route of disaggregation, but they have enshrined in it the continuing sexist principle that the married couple's allowance goes, in the first instance, to the man. Although we thoroughly endorse the principle, we note that the gains will be made primarily by people who are better off, especially under the provisions of clause 98.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that the Labour party claims to be in favour of independent taxation, but that it is not in favour of independent taxation of capital gains. If the Government removed the £5,000 exemption allowance from capital gains tax, we would be entirely and immediately in favour of independent taxation of capital gains. However, because that £5,000 exemption allowance will remain for both the husband and the wife and because the inclusion of that additional allowance is not the best use of taxpayers' money, we shall vote against clause 98.

We endorse the principle, but the Government's practice does not match up to their declared intentions. We urge the Government to go much further along the road to true independence.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) for saying that the Labour party welcomes the principle of disaggregation. This has been an interesting debate, and even the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) managed to describe the Government's proposals as a step forward. The fact that she said that was in itself a step forward. If the hon Lady will up her rhetoric in favour of the proposals, I shall downplay my rhetoric in favour of them. Perhaps we shall then find common ground.

Ms. Mowlam: If the Minister reads the report of the Second Reading debate he will find that I made exactly the same statement on that occasion. I shall adjust my rhetoric when he ups the degree of honesty that is to be found in the Budget proposals on what is actually happening to women.

Mr. Lamont: That was not, as I recall, how the hon. Lady seemed to present her opinion at the time of the Budget statement debates. However, I welcome her position in any event.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury asked about the building societies and described the effect of receiving interest that is paid net of tax. We shall have time to discuss the issue fully with the building societies in the run up to 1990. We do not expect the flows that will occur as a result of these measures to be in any way large when compared with the flows that we see taking place all the time.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) asked about joint and several liability in terms of taxation. He referred especially to a husband and wife working together in partnership. Where a husband and wife are in partnership, there will be a joint and several liability, but that is no different from the position of any two people who are in partnership. The arrangement will be no different from any other couple working together in that way.

Mr. Wigley: I was talking about a husband and wife, one or other or both of whom may be self-employed—not necessarily in a partnership together—with incomes that lead to the payment of income tax. I wanted to know whether in those circumstances there would be joint and several liability.

Mr. Lamont: If separately employed in different businesses, there is no joint and several liability. If a husband and wife are in a partnership, which I thought I heard the hon. Gentleman say, there will be a joint and several liability.

Joint and several liability applies to the community charge because the safety net covering liability to pay the charge for poorer households is linked to the support that is provided by the social security system. That system must necessarily take into account a household's combined resources.

Some hon. Members have suggested that the proposals do not affect a significant number. In fact, they do. Over 2 million will benefit, of whom 1·6 million will be married women. About 500,000 will be husbands.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), from the Opposition Front Bench, said that the Labour party favoured independent taxation. I think that he sought to give the impression that the aspiration and the aim were very much the same as the Government's. There is one crucial difference, however, and that emerged during the general election when the Labour party tried to keep a little quiet about its intention to abolish the married man's allowance. We are now talking about the married couple's allowance.

If the Labour party is in favour of getting rid of the married couple's allowance—a move that we are emphatically against—the cost will be about £7·16 per week to the basic rate taxpayer. It is the married couple's allowance that will keep 1 million people out of tax. About 12 million couples would lose if the proposals that appeared to be being advanced by the Labour party during the election were to be implemented.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I thought that I was measured and careful in what I said. It is rather naughty of the Minister to attribute remarks to me that I did not make.

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. He is always measured. I would never try to represent him otherwise. However, I received the impression that there is a desire to phase out the married couple's allowance, and I merely made clear the consequences.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) was not ambiguous about that in any way. He made an interesting speech and advocated that the married couple's allowance should be frozen in cash terms. He said that the same principle applying to the breadwinner wives should be applied to the married couple's allowance. With respect, I do not believe that the breadwinner wives' position is analogous. It is anomalous that two and a half times the single person's allowance should apply to breadwinner wives.

We believe that although, as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said, there may be some special circumstances, there are many one-earner couples and we cannot make a case for such a couple receiving two and a half times a single person's allowance. We believe that the married couple's allowance, which has been a feature of the tax system in one form or another, should be preserved. Even if it was preserved in cash terms, what the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed advocated would involve a gradual reduction in real terms.

Opposition Members tried to portray the measures as designed to benefit the wealthy. They seem to think that there is some way in which independent taxation can be introduced which will be of no benefit to the wealthy. An inevitable consequence of introducing independent taxation in any form is that it will involve some substantial gains for people with large incomes. However, Opposition Members should not misrepresent the fact that our changes will bring very substantial benefits to many people, and three quarters of the costs of independent taxation will go to basic rate taxpayers and non-taxpayers after the change. Some 1·2 million wives with an income under £5,000 a year will gain. Half the cost of independent taxation will go to the elderly, and 80 per cent. of elderly taxpayers will gain. All that amply shows that the reform is extremely beneficial to very many people.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East referred to introducing independent taxation in a fiscally neutral way. That makes no sense. There is no way in which we can introduce independent taxation on income on a fiscally neutral basis. If there is, the hon. Gentleman did not do much to enlighten the House about what he had in mind. He told us what he was going to do about capital gains tax, and I hope to show that it is complete and utter nonsense to have independent taxation for income and somehow to resile from that position for capital gains.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Minister is being uncharacteristically unfair and he misrepresents what we said. All that we advocated was progressive taxation on unearned income. We advocated nothing more than that. In other words, there should be redistribution from the wealthy to the less wealthy.

Mr. Lamont: I certainly did not want to misrepresent the hon. Gentleman. I am grateful to him for making his position clear. I assume that he means that the burden of the increasing progressive taxation will be spread over all taxpayers, whether or not they are beneficiaries of independent taxation. I do not think that that is necessarily a very logical position to adopt.

Several of my hon. Friends, notably my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson), referred to the married couple's allowance going to the man in the first place. the hon. Members for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and for Redcar rehearsed those arguments. They know, of course, that the allowance can be transferred to the wife. They have also heard me say that the effect of our proposals will achieve the right results in 99 per cent. of cases. Only in a quarter of 1 per cent. of cases will we not achieve the right result.

I make the point that with that one quarter of 1 per cent. one is talking about the better-off, and Opposition Members are advocating that I should give just a little bit more to the better-off. We have decided that that solution is not worth pursuing. Our solution will allow us to implement the proposals in 1990 and to advance the timetable, which would otherwise not have been feasible. I am not saying that a Government will not look at that matter again one day, but I emphasise that an enormous amount of work has been involved in getting the revenue and computer programmes ready to implement the measure by 1990. It is a tight timetable as it is.

The hon. Member for Gateshead spoke of the possible risks of forestalling and of couples transferring assets between them. Perhaps that will happen to some extent, but it will be a consequence of independent taxation. I do not for one minute believe that we could introduce the concept of taxing transfers between husband and wife. If Opposition Members reflect on that point, they will come to the conclusion that it would be far too draconian to prevent husbands and wives from switching assets between them.

One point that has not been mentioned in this debate, and which Opposition Members appear to have left totally out of account, is how we are to combine capital gains tax and income tax. The Opposition have not said that they are against taxing capital gains at income tax rates, so I presume that they are in favour. If they are, surely it follows logically that if capital is to be treated as income, capital gains also should be subject to a separate exemption for husband and wife. That seems to me to follow logically.

It is said that capital gains tax should be revenue-neutral. But what precisely does that mean? It can only mean one of two things: either that the annual exemption on capital gains would be reduced for everyone, penalising capital gains tax payers who are not married —which would be a nonsense—or introducing a lower exemption for husbands and wives than for single people. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed found that out when he was exploring the subject with the hon. Member for Caernarfon. Either way, that proposal makes not one jot of sense. I urge the Committee to support the clause.

Clause 98 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26

CORPORATION TAX: SMALL COMPANIES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

10.15 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): Since 1979 we have introduced a large number of measures to help small businesses. The Finance Bill introduces further measures. In particular, clause 26 reduces the rate of corporation tax on the profits of small companies from 27 to 25 per cent. Since we have been in office, the small companies rate of corporation tax has been cut by 17 percentage points from 42 to 25 per cent.

This is the sixth successive year in which we have been able to keep the rate of tax to the small company in line with the basic rate of income tax. It is now the marginal tax rate for the vast majority of unincorporated businesses. Out of a total of 418 companies paying corporation tax in 1985-86, the last year for which we have comprehensive figures, no fewer than 392,000 companies paid tax at the small companies rate. A further 19,000 were in the transitional band, still paying below the full corporation tax rate. Only about 7,000 companies in the United Kingdom paid the full standard rate of corporation tax.

The total number of companies in the low tax band has been increasing rapidly. Between 1982 and 1985-86 an additional 160,000 companies paid the small companies rate. The number of companies rising into the transitional and full tax zones has more than doubled, so more companies are paying more tax, but at lower rates. Above all, this reflects the return to profitability of British industry as well as an increase in the number of small businesses that have been started or expanded.

As a result of the progressive reduction in the small companies tax rate and related changes, the regime for small businesses in this country is now one of the most favourable in the industrialised world. We have a lower rate of corporation tax than most countries, we have a more favourable rate for small companies than most countries, and we have a wider band to which that rate applies than almost any other country. In short, Britain is now as attractive a country in which to establish and expand a small company as any of our major competitors and there is every incentive for our small companies to grow larger. The clause reinforces that position, and I am pleased to put it before the Committee.

Mr. Chris Smith: It might help if I said at the outset that we do not intend to divide on clause 26. We welcome its provisions, but there are a number of questions about it that ought to be answered.

First and foremost, the clause enshrines the principle of progressivity. The Labour party has advocated and will continue to advocate a much more progressive income tax system. The same principle ought, in fairness and logic, to be applied to corporation tax. That principle is enshrined in the proposal that there should be a 25 per cent. rate for companies whose profits do not exceed £100,000 and also in the consequential adjustment to the marginal relief fraction.

We also welcome the clause because we support and wish to encourage the growth and development of small businesses. The Chief Secretary told us in the Budget debate that the Government are doing far more for small businesses than have any previous Government. He told us that the number of small businesses is increasing at about 500 a week. That figure is more or less accurate. The number is 494 a week—a figure that is based on VAT-registered companies and VAT returns. It is worth pointing out that the equivalent increase for the the period 1974-79 was 417 a week. The Government have made a marginal improvement in the rate at which small businesses have been established, but the record of previous Labour Governments stands reasonable comparison.

The Government have taken a number of measures that doubtless they will claim encouraged the formation of small businesses, including provisions for a delay in the payment of tax by giving an average of several months' credit to small businesses. Those small businesses would probably nominate liability on the preceding year basis, which allows the offsetting of costs and expenses against tax. The Government would probably also claim to have helped small businesses through the self-employment schemes and national insurance changes. It is small wonder, therefore, that small businesses may have improved their position marginally over the lifetime of the Government.

The greatest factor affecting small businesses is the level of interest rates. In that regard, the Government do not have such a good record. To the detriment of small businesses and, indeed, business as a whole, we still have one of the highest real rates of interest of the entire developed world. That is not something of which the Government should be proud, even if it is a matter by which the Prime Minister seems to place so much store when considering the exchange rate level and the Government's inflation policy.

A further caveat should be entered. If we are placing so much importance on the development of small businesses, we should pay attention—the Government never seem to pay attention to this—to the increasing domination of our economy by large business and large-scale enterprise. The figures are startling. If we look at the number of firms in the United Kingdom representing the upper half of retail sales, we find that in 1950 there were 4,750. By 1961, the figure had fallen to 1,700. By 1971, it had fallen further to 930. According to 1985 figures, the figure now is 94. The concentration and centralisation of economic power which that represents is something about which the Government should be more concerned. It is fine to talk about promotion being available for small businesses but at the same time a blind eye is being turned to the agglomeration of an enormous amount of economic power into the hands of a small number of companies.

The further change in the corporation tax rate for small businesses may encourage payments to be made to shareholder-directors in the form of dividends rather than a salary. If a privately owned small company makes a profit and distributes it as dividend to basic rate tax paying shareholders, it pays corporation tax at 25 per cent., against which the shareholder's personal income tax can be set.

That results in a tax burden of 25 per cent. to the company and zero per cent. to the shareholders, giving a net tax rate of 25 per cent. If, however, the same profit is paid as salary to the directors, who, in small companies, are also likely to be the shareholders, the company has to pay 10·45 per cent. in national insurance and the employees have to pay 9 per cent. national insurance on top of their basic rate tax. The net tax burden in such circumstances is therefore 41 per cent. I think that we are entitled to ask whether it is right that we have a system which, because of how national insurance operates, encourages that device.

Broadly speaking, we favour the clause. We shall not divide the Committee but simply want the Government to be a little more honest and realistic about small businesses and the desire—theirs and ours—to encourage the enterprise that they represent. Moreover, the Government should cover the efforts of small businesses and the Opposition's attitude with less of a gloss than they sometimes apply.

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): I, too, sincerely welcome clause 26. Any reduction in the tax payable by small companies is desirable, to say the least, but I am worried lest we leave it there.

Small companies usually try to expand. They often borrow heavily and are not flush with cash. It is irksome to make a profit and then have to pay out quite a lot of it in taxation. A company may be keen to expand or re-equip, especially in view of present challenges, such as preparing for 1992. It is important that our small firms are as well equipped and prepared for 1992 as are those in Germany or France. Moreover, they must face competition from engineering companies in South Korea and Taiwan.

When companies want to retain cash for further development or research and development—I am not talking about those which milk profits to pay directors or use schemes such as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) described—we should make it as easy as possible for them to put their profits back to work. That is always more difficult for small companies. They cannot be as fast on their feet as a large company with a chain of accountants looking for every possible way in which to delay or avoid paying taxes.

We are talking here of corporation tax for small companies being in line with income tax. That is great, and I hope that we will keep it that way. It prevents any temptation to switch funds or to take them out of the company. There is a problem with the existing structure. I have argued for a graduated corporation tax. At the moment there is a marginal rate between £100,000 and £500,000. The effective rate for companies of this size is 37·5 per cent., which is 2·5 per cent. over the higher rate. I always think that that is a bit of a discouragement. It causes a company to think seriously about putting the brakes on at £100,000 and perhaps using all sorts of devious ways to stop paying that tax. I want to see a system that alleviates that.

I do not want a system under which companies waste money. That always worries me. Sometimes an accountant says to a company, "You are going to make a profit, so it might be a good idea if you got rid of some money. Perhaps you ought to buy yourself a new Merc, refurbish the office or buy some equipment." Such spending does not occur because a company wants it to, but because it is a way of getting rid of some of the money. I do not like that, and I hope that we will look at that point. Let us make sure that we do not put things in the path of small businesses so that as they grow they design their business round the tax system. That is wrong. The tax sytem should be there to take money when people are making profits, but we should make it simpler. When we talk about a progressive tax, I hope that that is what we mean and that we will not have the clawback position that we have now.

We have put corporation tax in line with personal income tax, so what about providing an allowance for tiny companies? For personal income tax there is an allowance of £2,605. For a large company that does not mean anything. However, for small companies, we should have a band of profits that are tax-free at the lower end. It could be linked to the personal allowance, but it could be higher, at perhaps £5,000 or £10,000. I am suggesting that because we should try to encourage companies to put cash back into the business. We should encourage small businesses to do that regularly.

As I said earlier, we are looking towards 1992 and we want to make sure that companies are equipped to face the position then. The most important thing they can do to equip themselves is to ensure that they have the most modern tools and machinery and that they invest money in research and development. Often a company starts well and gets its own share of the market, but if it does not plough money back into research and development, it loses that share of the market.

I welcome the clause and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on what he has introduced. However, I hope that he will look at the points that I have raised because they bother me as a small business man, and I know that they bother most of the small business men to whom I have spoken.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) made some interesting suggestions. This is not the moment to go into the list of things that small businesses would like to see modified to make their lot easier. However, I should like to place on record the fact that we welcome the reduction in small business corporation tax.

We suggested to the Chancellor that he might use the corporation tax device that was so successfully used by the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe) when he was Chancellor, which was to carry out a phased reduction in corporation tax for large as well as small companies. That produced an incentive to investment, which might have been a productive step to take in current circumstances. There are quite strong arguments for doing so. The present Chancellor has not done that, but he has at least given the corporation tax reductions for small businesses in this clause and we welcome them.

Mr. Lilley: I do not intend to detain the Committee, but I should like to respond to a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) to whom I pay tribute as a doughty defender of small businesses. He raised the question whether there should be a tax-free band for small businesses. There is a problem in that that would create a more favourable position for incorporated business than for unincorporated businesses. Also, it would presumably have to be available for all companies large and small, or we would have the problem of clawing it back, which would create a somewhat higher rate while it was being clawed back. My hon. Friend said that that happens under the present system, when we move from the rate for small companies to the standard rate. The clawback rate in that intermediate zone is significantly below the low rate that we used to have for small companies. Therefore, the position is not too serious and companies generally feel better off than they did.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) for the fact that he does not propose to divide the Committee. I welcome the Committee's support for the cause of small businesses. I confess that I am slightly puzzled that the Labour party thinks that business men should pay a lower rate of tax than the ordinary man in the street, but that is for it to explain to the electorate.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 26 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

To report progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Committee report progress; to sit again tomorrow.

PETITION

Rating Reform

10.37 pm

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of several constituents of Glasgow, Maryhill, including the Ruchill unemployed workers centre, Milton community council, Maryhill "B" tenants association, Cadder residents association, Woodside tenants association, Botany action group, Maryhill elderly forum, Lambhill community council and Lambhill senior citizens.

The petition is addressed

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

that the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act provides for the introduction in Scotland of the system of Community Charge or Poll Tax which will impose upon the people of Scotland a system of local taxation which will take no account of the ability of the citizens to afford such taxation and will cause hardship to many who are already poor. The Community Charge or Poll Tax will cause the redistribution of resources away from the poor areas into areas which are already prosperous. It will be expensive to operate and its collection will entail invasions of privacy and allocation to each adult Scot of an algorithm or personal computer identification number.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your Honourable House repeal the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

I presented a similar petition some months ago. The people of Maryhill are no more in favour of the poll tax than they were then. Last Friday night the people living in Braid square in Woodside informed me that a poll tax canvasser was going about knocking on their doors at half-past 10 at night delivering the poll tax forms. She had a can of beer in her hand. I do not think that any hon. Member would attempt to justify such conduct, nor do I think that this behaviour was ever expected when the authorities embarked upon the distribution of the poll tax forms. I warn the House that this is the kind of thing that is likely to happen when poll tax canvassers are paid 40p per successful form completed and are largely recruited through their local jobcentre, which tells them that they must take on this occupation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but she is now arguing the case, which she must not do when presenting a petition.

Mrs. Fyfe: In that case I shall conclude, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by presenting the petition, in the hope that the House will pay heed to my constituents' wishes.

To lie upon the Table.

Government Departments (Relocation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

10.39 pm

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): I am pleased to have the opportunity of a short debate on the relocation of Government Departments and the dispersal of civil servants, not simply because I think that it is an important policy objective but because the Government share that view.

In 1979 the Government made a commitment to relocate civil servants and Government Departments. They said that they would relocate 5,900 posts. I cannot criticise the Government in that regard because to date they are on course to meet that target. As I understand it, 5,500 posts have already been dispersed and the remainder of the process is in train.

In addition, 6,000 posts have been dispersed on Departments' own initiative. It would be interesting to know how they exercise their initiative in this regard. That means that over the past nine years about 11,500—shortly to be 11,900—posts have been dispersed, out of a Civil Service consisting of more than 500,000 individuals. My question is whether the progress to date is satisfactory. I say that because, even though the target will have been achieved, it was an exceedingly modest one in the first place. Given that it was a modest target, perhaps it could have been achieved more quickly.

It is said—especially by civil servants—that four fifths of the Civil Service is located outside Greater London. I have checked the facts, and that is absolutely true. However, as with all statistics, one needs to look behind the figures to find out exactly what they mean. While those statistics are factually correct, an analysis of the number of staff by economic planning region gives a wholly different picture. I considered non-industrial Civil Service staff in England, although I readily agree that I could have chosen the whole of the United Kingdom.

I found that the south-east has the considerable total of 46·6 per cent. Dear old Yorkshire and Humberside—the House will understand why I call it that—has 7·2 per cent.; the west midlands has 7·1 per cent.; the north 7·4 per cent.; the east midlands 4·8 per cent., the north-west 12 cent., the south-west 11·3 per cent., while East Anglia comes up tail-end Charlie with about 3·2 per cent.

Mr. Timothy Devlin (Stockton, South): I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend in mid-flow. Is he not appalled that out of about 600,000 civil servants in the United Kingdom, only 33,600 are in the northern region? Does that not show a signal failure on the Government's part to sell the northern region, with all its strengths, to civil servants, who should be moving north and making a valuable contribution to the local economy?

Mr. Cran: My hon. Friend makes his own point in his usual eloquent fashion, although he perhaps uses rather more extravagant language than I would use. I heard what he said, and there is no doubt that others did.

Let us move on to consider industrial civil servants, again in England. I shall not go through the figures, but essentially they are no different from those for non-industrial civil servants. When one puts the two together, one finds that the south-east of England is way ahead in its ability to attract and keep civil servants at the total of 46 per cent.

I have not mentioned Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland because in a sense those three countries prove the point. They have their own Departments of State, and Scotland has almost 10 per cent. of the total number of civil servants in the United Kingdom. What is good for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland might be good for some of the other regions apart from the south-east. The gist of my remarks, therefore, is that the south-east is doing well and the other regions are doing extremely badly.

I am not one of that band of people who believe that we should disperse civil servants for the sake of doing so. If it is not cost-effective and does not increase or maintain efficiency, we should not do it, but there is no iron rule to suggest that if greater numbers of civil servants were distributed throughout the other regions either of those criteria could not be met. Indeed, cost-effectiveness can be measured. Inner London weighting cost the taxpayer the fairly substantial—some would say staggering—total of £675·5 million in the five years from 1983-84 to 1987-88. If I am correct in assuming that in the Government's view more civil servants could be dispersed, a considerable proportion of that sum could have been saved.

In saying that, I pay tribute to the fact that this Government of all Governments have been extremely careful in their management of public expenditure. I believe that the same could be equally true in this area. In addition to inner London weighting, there are intermediate and outer London zone costs, London pay additions, inner London secretarial allowances and London allowances for lawyers, accountants and those whom we have all learnt to love—tax inspectors. In other words, a myriad costs of this kind have grown up in an extremely tight labour market. That is another reason why relocation policy should perhaps be more aggressively considered.

There are other reasons. For some reason that is not entirely clear to me, it seems that in London civil servants work 41 hours per week whereas outside London they work 42 hours. Clearly, if more of them were outside London they would produce an extra hour's work each, which would again save taxpayers' money.

Resignation rates are an important consideration for any employer, and in this context the Government are the employer. For reasons that we all understand, resignation rates are far higher in the south-east than in any other region. That, again, entails additional and, in my view, needless costs to the taxpayer.

In addition to the manpower costs, there are office costs. It costs not far short of £300 million per annum in rent, rates and maintenance for all our buildings in Greater London. The Treasury guide to office rental values which has been laid in the Library shows that considerable savings could be made if offices were opened in other regions. To give the House the flavour of the situation, new office accommodation per square foot costs between £25 and £57 in City—my right hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt say that we do not have many offices there, and I take the point—£18·50 to £40 in the west end, in the London suburbs £7·50 to £17, in dear old Yorkshire and Humberside £4·75 to £7 and in the west midlands £3 to £8·50. It does not take a chartered accountant to work out the savings that could be made if we had a more aggressive policy.

That is the cost-effectiveness argument. What about the efficiency argument? Nothing in the Treasury guidelines suggests any major efficiency obstacles; quite the contrary. The hoary old arguments that we have all heard about bad communications between London and offices relocated to Hull, Humberside or Stockton are nonsense. The Government's communications network covers the entire nation and can be adapted in almost any way to meet new technology. The developments in information technology, including visual and document transmission, render the arguments about bad communications completely out of date.

If I had longer, I could outline many other reasons why I believe that we should be more aggressive, but I shall canter quickly over three of them. The first is the contribution to regional economies. That significant reason has been accepted by the Government in the Treasury guidelines. An example is the move of the Manpower Services Commission to Sheffield. There is no evidence to show that that move was not extremely good, and there is plenty of evidence to show how it has affected the local economy.

Secondly, the regions have a stake in the government of the United Kingdom. We must dispel the notion that London-based means London-biased, although we understand why it has occurred. The civil servants who are out in the regions tend not to be the policy-makers. Far from it. They tend to be mainly functional. The further away civil servants are from the south-east, not only are there fewer of them but they are less senior. As one who has spoken to and worked with more regional directors of more Departments than anyone, I can honestly say that most of them believe that being sent to a region is like being sent to Siberia. They always keep their houses in the south of England because they know that they will move back. The simple reason is that most of the Civil Service is here.

The third point is the benefit to civil servants. This is an extremely difficult problem for the Government, but they are no different from other employers who must communicate with their work force. I hope that the Government will communicate aggressively with civil servants to show the advantage of relocation. My right hon. Friend the Minister is my Member of Parliament. When I was elected to the House, I had to buy a flat in Westminster, which cost twice as much as a four-bedroomed house in Yorkshire and Humberside. What a compelling reason for a civil servant to want to be relocated. But the facts must be presented to him.

To give my right hon. Friend the opportunity to reply, I end by saying that I have some anxiety about our relocation policy and the modest achievements that we have had to date. I do not say that we made a promise and did not keep it, because we indubitably did. But the targets were too modest, and there was a propensity to relocate out of Greater London simply to overspill into the south-east and the regions adjacent to it. I am worried that no more central targets will be set. From the experience of all the jobs that I did before I came to the House, I know that unless targets are set from on high, it is easy to find reasons not to do what is required. I am worried about that, and, therefore, the passive nature of the policy requires further consideration.

[Mr. Cran]

I am assuaged in going a little further only by the fact that there will be annual surveys of progress by Government Departments—perhaps my right hon. Friend will tell us when those are due—and that annual efficiency gains will be sought from Government Departments. Perhaps that will act as a spur to relocation.

We need greater progress. If the subject were debated on another occasion, hon. Members would agree that we should not return in another nine or 10 years to find that all we had done was to relocate 5,900 civil servants, plus the other 6,000. The other regions of the United Kingdom simply will not understand such lack of progress.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) on his success in the ballot and on his choice of subject for our short debate.

If I had not known before of my hon. Friend's considerable interest in matters of Civil Service location generally and, of course, of his constituency and regional interest in these issues, the large number of pointed parliamentary questions that he has asked me and others over recent months would have left me in no doubt of it.

My hon. Friend's choice of subject gives me a timely opportunity to elaborate a little on the Government's policy on the location of Government work, to provide some further background on the new phase of that policy that I announced to the House in March, and to assure my hon. Friend of the Government's continuing commitment to relocation, wherever that is efficient and cost-effective.

As my hon. Friend has rightly said, in 1979, we announced a programme for dispersing 5,900 Civil Service jobs out of London. As he acknowledges, that programme has been a success and is all but complete. Some 5,560 jobs have already been relocated as a consequence. The locations to which they have gone are widespread and include Sheffield, Glasgow, East Kilbride, Southend, Salisbury and Norwich. Planning is in hand for the small balance of 340 jobs remaining for dispersal under the 1979 programme.

Over and above that centrally run dispersal programme, individual Departments have, at their own initiative, relocated a considerable number of jobs, or created new ones, out of London and the south-east. In all, those amount to well over 6,000. They include, for example, a new office with 150 posts created by Her Majesty's Land Registry in Hull, and increases in the number of Department of Health and Social Security jobs in North Fylde, Lytham St. Annes and Preston of almost 1,200. My hon. Friend and the House will also be aware of the recent decision to relocate the Patent Office to Newport, which should create at least 500 new jobs locally.

In all, therefore, since 1979, some 12,000 Civil Service jobs have been located or created outside London and the south-east, about half through the centrally managed dispersal programme and half at the intitiative of individual Departments.

That has contributed significantly to a substantial spread of Civil Service work and job opportunities throughout Britain, particularly when it is remembered that during this period the Civil Service has fallen significantly in size. The present picture is that about four fifths of all civil servants already work outside greater London and more than three fifths work outside London and the south-east. My hon. Friend will be more aware than most that the Yorkshire and Humberside region was a major beneficiary of the Government's dispersal programme. The move of 1,760 Manpower Services Commission jobs from London to Sheffield accounts for almost one third of the total number of posts so far dispersed under this programme.

The figures that I have just quoted are good, but before I come to our plans for the future I should like to say a word about the interesting figures that my hon. Friend gave for civil servants in the English regions. I am not sure that I could endorse the details he gave, but the overall picture he paints is, within its limits, a fair one. The south-east has a larger proportion of civil servants—industrial and non-industrial—than any other English region, or than Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. It also has a significantly larger population than any other region, and if one looks at the number of civil servants per thousand of population the picture is rather different. The northern region, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) referred, has almost as many —and the south-west region has more—civil servants per head of population as London and the south-east, despite the fact that the south-east region includes the national capital and seat of Government.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley was seeking to create the impression that no other English region has the same or a higher proportion of civil servants as Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland, I hope that he will allow me to correct him. At 1 April last year, the north-west region of England had 10 per cent. and the south-west region over 9 per cent. of the total non-industrial Civil Service—that is, civil servants in the United Kingdom as a whole—compared to just under 10 per cent. in Scotland, about 5 per cent. in Wales and just over 0·5 per cent. in Northern Ireland.

I assure my hon. Friend that the Government do not intend to rest on the progress already made. When, on 31 March, I informed the House in a written answer of the successful completion or near completion of the 1979 dispersal programme, I announced also a new phase in Government policy on the location of their work. I explained that, though no further central targets for relocation would be set, Departments would be reviewing the location of their work with a view, in suitable cases, to finding locations offering advantages in terms of recruitment and retention of staff, value for money and other considerations relevant to service delivery and management.

After careful thought, we decided that it would not now be sensible to have a new version of the dispersal programme of 1979, which was centrally managed and had overall statistical targets, but that we would instead exploit the tide of individual departmental initiative for relocation that has been running strongly in the past few years and has, as I said, led to the actual or planned relocation of as many jobs as the formal dispersal programme itself.

There are a number of reasons for this. First, it is consistent with the general trend in Civil Service management, which is to avoid central direction where possible and place the power to make decisions and the responsibility for making them with individual Departments acting within a clear framework of policy and with clearly defined incentives to take sensible decisions. It seems to us that decisions taken in this way are likely to be better decisions than those taken in conformity with some massive central blueprint or master plan which would, very likely, be the product of a vast interdepartmental committee—probably meeting, incidentally, in the SW1 postal district.

Secondly, it is consistent with the general change that has been taking place in the economy and in decision-making processes. Property is cheaper and staff are easier to find, outside the south-east. Sensible businesses are increasingly exploiting these advantages, and we want to build on the wish of individual Government Departments to do the same.

My hon. Friend has some doubts that Departments will respond without central direction. But they have already shown that they are keen to do so. It is of the essence that I cannot forecast now exactly how many jobs will be relocated as a consequence of this new phase of our policy, but I am sure that all Departments will look seriously and sensibly at the options, and that if the trend of the past few years is any guide, a substantial number of jobs will be relocated, to the benefit of the efficiency of the Departments concerned, of their costs and the value for money that they give, and of the economic conditions in the receiving localities. I know that my ministerial colleagues are committed to this programme.

My hon. Friend refers to the guidelines for Departments on the location of work. These guidelines emphasise the importance of thorough reviews based on the principles that I have mentioned. They also require Departments to give adequate weight to Government policy for the regeneration of regions and inner cities and provide in a good deal of detail examples of the kind of cost and labour supply advantages that relocation can bring. I might add that they also offer the prospect, in suitable cases, of some short-term help from the Treasury with the transitional costs of relocation. Those costs can be significant, and we are anxious that they should not be a disincentive to achieving the longer-term benefits.

The new guidance takes account of the regional policy dimension in terms agreed with the regional and territorial Departments. It requires that "For all major possible relocations, i.e. those involving more than 100 people, the department should consider any site or sites suggested by the territorial or regional policy departments within assisted or urban programme areas and include at least the most favourable of these in their list of costed options, even if this does not provide the greatest overall saving the move must, however, generate a positive Net Present Value".

The new guidelines have been firmly linked to running costs and to the public expenditure survey; first, because we considered that the policy might work better if the Treasury agreed to consider requests for help with transitional costs by additions to running costs limits; secondly because some expenditure benefits might be expected to be achieved if relocation were chosen; and, thirdly, because the Treasury would need to "keep the score" of the overall plans and achievements of Departments as the new policy progressed. In addition, Treasury expenditure divisions will ensure, within the context of the annual expenditure survey arrangements, that Departments produce worthwhile and relevant proposals on relocation in accordance with the guidelines.

It is clear that there are benefits in the longer term from sensible decisions on location and relocation. We have not done, retrospectively, a full cost-benefit analysis of the dispersal programme undertaken in 1979, but there is evidence that sensible decisions can lead to considerable savings. For example, a recent report submitted to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland evaluates very positively the results of dispersing part of the Overseas Development Administration from central London to East Kilbride in 1981. I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend intends to publish the report in the near future. I am sure that my hon. Friend will read it with interest and encouragement, and I have already made arrangements to circulate it to Government Departments generally as an example of the benefits that can be achieved.

As I am sure that the House will recognise, relocation is not the answer to every Civil Service problem; nor should it be seen as an automatic device for spreading employment opportunities. Some Civil Service work will have to remain in London and the south-east. People who live in these areas need local services just as much as people living elsewhere—jobcentre clients, for example. Although modern communications, technology and good transport links now mean that much work can be done elsewhere, some Civil Service work will always have to be done in close proximity to Parliament, Ministers and the City.

My hon. Friend mentioned the attitude of the Civil Service unions. It is of course important, in introducing policies of this kind, to consider the position of the staff who will be subject to the new arrangements. We have given an assurance to the Civil Service unions that, when jobs are relocated, every effort will be made to avoid the compulsory transfer of people in mobile grades and to find alternative jobs within reasonable travel distance for non-mobile grades. We have also confirmed, in the guidelines, the existing requirement on Departments to consult their own trade union sides when planning relocations; and, while there are issues which I have no doubt that the unions will wish to discuss further with the Treasury, I see no ground for pessimism.

In sum, I am sure that this new phase of location policy will yield considerable benefits—to Departments, to the public that they serve, to the Exchequer and to the localities which receive new Civil Service jobs. I will at the earliest suitable opportunity—probably some time next year—give the House some account of the progress made and planned. I am sure that my hon. Friend, with his enthusiasm for the subject, will not be alone among hon. Members in following this progress with keen interest. He has done a service to that cause and process by his detailed and eloquent treatment of the matter tonight.

To conclude on a personal note, as the local Member of Parliament for SW1 and adjacent places, I should say that 3 per cent. of the working population of the entire country comes to work in my constituency daily, leaving the rest of the House to look after the remaining 97 per cent. I am not jealous and I should be happy to see many of those people going to work elsewhere to the good of the rest of the economy.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Nurses' Pay

1. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what account the Government's review of nurses' pay takes of the problem of high living costs in areas like Southend-on-Sea; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. John Moore): The independent review body examined the question of selective pay supplements and said that for staff outside the London area it would be sensible to wait until the new grading structure has had time to take effect. The review body suggested it would then be possible to decide more accurately whether, and if so what, further geographical pay incentives may be required.

Mr. Taylor: Is the Secretary of State aware that, while the nursing pay review was widely welcomed in the profession and owed a great deal to his initiative, nurses and other public servants working on national wage scales feel discriminated against because of the uniquely high cost of living in some areas, of which Southend is an example? As it is a long time since we had a visit from a Health Minister to our excellent hospitals in Southend, will my right hon. Friend, or one of his colleagues, be willing to visit one of our hospitals and speak to the nurses about their problems?

Mr. Moore: Having had some considerable involvement with the hospitals in my hon. Friend's area, I shall be delighted to accept his courteous invitation. Having said that, I stress that the recommendations of the review body and the problem of geographical pay beyond the Thames region will obviously not go away.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Since the fringe zone weighting in Sir James Cleminson's report goes out as far as east Berkshire, should it not reach as far as Reading? I suggest that the cost of living in Reading is every bit as high as anywhere in the outer region of London, if not as high as in London itself. Does not the problem of recruiting nurses there owe much to the fact that the cost of living in Reading is as high as it is in London?

Mr. Moore: I stressed that I was repeating the comments of the review body. I am conscious of the particular problems of recruitment in the M4 corridor. The Government are conscious of some of the geographical pay difficulties and will not ignore the point that my hon. Friend has made.

NHS Ancillary Staff (Pay)

2. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress towards a pay award for the National Health Service ancillary staff and how it is to be funded.

4. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress towards a pay award for the National Health Service ancillary staff and how it is to be funded.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): Pay of NHS ancillary staff is a matter for negotiation in the ancillary staffs Whitley council. I understand that negotiations stand adjourned until 18 May. Health authorities are expected to meet general pay increases from their cash allocations and cost improvement programmes.

Mr. Marshall: The Minister's reply is wholly unsatisfactory. When will the Government stop treating ancillary workers as the poor relations of the Health Service and provide health boards with enough extra funds to give ancillary workers a fairer deal, without cutting any other aspect of the Health Service?

Mr. Newton: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that under the present Government ancillary workers have had an increase in real terms of just under 4 per cent., which compares with a reduction in real terms of 10 per cent. under the Labour Administration.

Mr. Griffiths: Will the Minister turn his eye away from history and look at the present? Does he realise that all health authorities see the people they employ as part of a total team committed to caring for the patient? Will he now commit the Government to a similar award for ancillary workers and ensure that the health authorities have the money to fund it properly?

Mr. Newton: Having spent eight years as a member of an Administration who have made this country's economy the strongest for a generation and made possible real terms increases in pay of many workers in the Health Service and elsewhere, to which I have referred, I have no intention of turning away from that history.

Mr. Fearn: Is the Minister aware that scientists in the NHS, as well as ancillary workers, have no pay review body and that their pay has fallen behind by 48 per cent.? Does the Minister have any intention of establishing a pay review body for them?

Mr. Newton: The answer to the latter part of the question is no, but if the hon. Gentleman is referring to medical laboratory scientific officers, who form an important group, he will know that there has been active examination of restructuring proposals, which I hope will help to solve some of the problems there.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Minister cannot pass the buck for the negotiations. Is he aware that the Whitley council adjourned so that the management side could consult him? What answer did he give? Does he recognise that, in the seven years since Clegg, the pay of ancillary staff has fallen behind the retail prices index, leaving the poorest even poorer paid? Will he concede that these are often the same people who are experiencing whopping cuts in their housing benefit? How long is he prepared to be Britain's largest employer of Britain's lowest paid workers?

Mr. Newton: I have already said that this group has had a real terms pay increase under this Administration, compared with a real terms pay reduction under the Labour Administration. We shall negotiate in good faith on the basis of a further offer, which no doubt the management side will make when the negotiations resume.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

3. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority; and what subjects were discussed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): My right hon. Friend last met the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority on 22 March. I have had the pleasure of meeting him three times since January. A number of issues were discussed, including expenditure on health services in the west midlands, which now stands at a whopping £1·2 billion, an increase of some 34 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79.

Mr. Coombs: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the increase of 30 per cent. since 1979 has led to a large increase in medical staff and to an increase of 24 per cent. in in-patients being treated within the region? Will she also confirm that the districts within the regional health authority have set up their own version of the Government's resource management initiative to allow resources to be allocated not only on the basis of perceived need but to those districts which, like my own, use them most efficiently?

Mrs. Currie: The West Midlands regional health authority is doing a cracking good job. Last year it admitted 700,000 in-patients—13,500 per week. It dealt with nearly 4 million out-patient visits last year—12,400 each working day. Many people have reason to be satisfied with the NHS in the west midlands.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Under-Secretry of State check her diary and confirm that she was not present at the meeting on 22 March between the Secretary of State and the chairman of the regional health authority? I was, along with some of my hon. Friends, and we were given to understand that we would be informed of the cuts that were due to take place in this financial year before they took place in known areas, at the instigation of the chairman and with the agreement of the Secretary of State. We are still waiting for that information.

Mrs. Currie: I am sure that my right hon. Friend enjoyed the meeting that he had with the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends. However, I think that the hon. Gentleman misheard me. I said that expenditure on the west midlands health services now stands at £1·2 billion, which is a record in both cash and real terms. The authority is employing a record number of staff, it has a record hospital building programme, and it is looking after a record number of patients.

Dame Jill Knight: At meetings with the chairman, did my hon. Friend discuss waiting lists in the west midlands, which are worrying many people? Has she any news to give to the House on that matter?

Mrs. Currie: Yes. Again, the west midlands has been making considerable progress. The latest figures that we have, for the summer quarter ending September 1987, show that waiting lists had dropped by 6 per cent. in six months, that 42,000 people had been treated from the waiting list, and that the median wait was only six weeks, and falling.

Social Security

5. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources his Department is devoting to monitoring the effects of the recent social security changes.

Mr. Moore: The effects of the social security reforms are being monitored using a wide range of data derived from my Department's management, expenditure and statistical returns and from the family expenditure and general household survey. The collection and analysis of this data involve a substantial staff effort, but it is not possible to provide a reliable estimate of the cost.

Mr. Dalyell: Why are those on junior rates, who are mostly under 25 and students, excluded from the transitional arrangements?

Mr. Moore: I am not absolutely certain how that relates to the orginal question, but I shall endeavour to answer it.

The transitional arrangements refer specifically to certain groups—the disabled, widows, pensioners and families with children. Throughout the social security reform an attempt was rightly made by the Government, after long consultation and debate, to target help away from those who are younger and independent.

Mr. Sims: Following the changes that my right hon. Friend recently announced, how soon local authorities will be given details so that they can implement the changes to housing benefit? Similarly, when will DHSS offices know about the changes involving hardship cases?

Mr. Moore: I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to confirm in reply to later questions that by the end of this week we should be able to notify specific local authorities. The new unit is being set up this week, and free phone facilities should be in operation within 24 hours.

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware that the way in which industrial injury benefit and invalidity benefit are taken into account for housing benefit is having a dramatic effect on tens of thousands of homes? I spent a most depressing week in my constituency talking to constituents who have lost £10, £15, £20 and £25 a week. That is outrageous. What will the Secretary of State do about it?

Mr. Moore: If the right hon. Gentleman checks the very helpful letter that my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Services and the Disabled wrote to him last Thursday, he will see that transitional protection covers the particular problem to which he is referring, as it relates to those who are above income support level but for whom there were local authority discretionary schemes which theoretically under the law stopped at the beginning of last month. They are covered by the transitional arrangements.

Mr. McCrindle: I welcomed the announcement two weeks ago that in future beneficiaries in certain categories should not be more than £2·50 a week worse off, but am I correct in thinking that that does not take into account the 20 per cent. contribution to rates? If so, as a large number of the complaints that I continue to receive are about the effect of having to pay that contribution, may we have an assurance that that will continue to be monitored? If the conclusion reached is that the principle is good, may it be that we are going too far too quickly?

Mr. Moore: As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said on another occasion, we shall continue to monitor this area. However, I would not want to give my hon. Friend false encouragement, because the 20 per cent. contribution to local authority rates was not expected to be covered by the transitional protection.

Mr. Kennedy: One of the things that the Department is monitoring over the transitional period is the number of single payment claims which were outstanding at 11 April, about which I have a later question. Will the Secretary of State give us the average figure, for regional offices within Scotland, of outstanding single payments?

Mr. Moore: I would not wish to abuse the Order Paper and leap to a further question. However, we have had only the first month of initial monitoring of offices in Scotland, and that would be an incorrect statistical basis on which to make a judgment. For example, I know that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) would not like us to make judgments on the basis of the Bathgate office, where, not untypically, only half the loans provision was used in the first month—a fraction of the grant. However, we are watching the details with great care, and we shall keep the House well informed.

Mr. Hayes: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his swift and sensitive adjustments, but will he make it absolutely clear that if any further injustices appear he will also be swift and sensitive in rectifying them?

Mr. Moore: I thank my hon. Friend for recognising that the Government moved very fast in making these adjustments. This Government, who were involved in a rapid change affecting 8·5 million people and an expenditure of £14-plus billion, and who made modifications to the tune of £100 million, deserve my hon. Friend's congratulations.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Secretary of State accept that the Department ought to heed the results of the monitoring within the Department and by outside reputable bodies? If it had heeded the advance warnings that it received over the last three years about the results of the changes, the transitional protection, for which the Secretary of State has just claimed credit would have been unnecessary, and a great deal of suffering and anxiety would have been avoided. Will he pay special attention to the monitoring of the social fund, from which most applicants, including the young, will be excluded because of its totally inadequate budget?

Mr. Moore: We shall monitor carefully all aspects of the changes. We have already made a clear public commitment to commission independent research into the social fund. It has already been announced in a private notice question that that research will start in the spring of 1989. I confirm that announcement.

Independent Living Fund

6. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the first payments to be made from the Independent Living Fund; and what arrangements for interim payments he has made.

11. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the first payments to be made from the Independent Living Fund and what arrangements for interim payments he has made.

The Minister for Social Security and the Disabled (Mr. Nicholas Scott): Payments from the Independent Living Fund will be made in the near future when it is legally established. Meanwhile, a number of applications have been received and decisions on interim payments are being made by officials, with professional advice. Final decisions will be taken by the trustees.

Dr. Moonie: Is the Minister aware of the anger and frustration of the voluntary organisations involved in the care of severely disabled people in the community? Will he give a categorical assurance now that the scheme will be fully in place within a very short time?

Mr. Scott: The fact that the scheme is not fully in place should not inhibit anybody from making an application. We have sent out 70 forms in response to inquiries, and 25 completed forms have been returned. Visits by social workers are beginning to take place. The fund is working. I urge anybody who feels that he might be entitled to benefit from the fund to apply as soon as possible to the Department.

Mr. Patchett: Is the Minister able to say why the sum of £5 million was established for the fund? Was it based on the likely number of applicants? Does the Minister have the power to increase its budget should that be necessary?

Mr. Scott: Bearing in mind that there is transitional protection for claimants who were receiving benefits before the change to the new system, I am confident that the £5 million is sufficient to cope with the demand this year. We have said that we will look at the budget amount for subsequent years in the light of experience gained during the first 12 months.

Mr. Wigley: The fund is a useful interim step towards helping disabled people to live in the community, but the real step that is now urgently needed is to implement in full the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986. Given the highlighting of very difficult and heartrending cases on the Esther Rantzen programme in the last three weeks, will the Minister now give an undertaking that section 7 of the Act will be implemented as rapidly as possible to minimise the difficulties that face people who are trying to live in the community after having left long-stay institutions?

Mr. Scott: Discussions are taking place on the further implementation of the Act. We need the results of the survey by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, and in due course we shall have to look at the pattern of benefits in an overall and coherent fashion.

Mr. Alfred Morris: As the extreme hardship that this fund was supposed to prevent dates from 11 April, is it not outrageous that on 10 May the fund has still not been legally constituted? Has the Minister seen the charge made by the major voluntary organisations for the disabled, that he has seriously underestimated the number of hardship cases? How can he possibly defend a regime that leaves hundreds of thousands of disabled people worse off by reference to a scheme that will help fewer than 300 and that still has not been formally set up?

Mr. Scott: I think that the right hon. Gentleman ought to have listened to the reply that I gave earlier about the arrangements that had been made to ensure that nobody suffers or endures delay because trustees have not yet been appointed or the trust deed agreed. Anybody who feels that he is entitled to benefit should apply now. I am confident that the £5 million will be adequate to cope with the demand on the fund in the first 12 months.

EC (Pensions)

7. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the levels of state pensions in each of the member states of the European Community, taking account of the cost of living in each country; and if he will place in the Library a copy of a league table based on those figures.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Michael Portillo): Only three countries in the European Community—the United Kingdom, Denmark and Ireland—have flat-rate pensions payable to most pensioners. Earnings-related pensions in the other countries are linked to the individual's own earnings, and there is no fixed pension level. Spending on programmes for the elderly in the United Kingdom as a share of gross domestic product is the third highest in Europe.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does the Minister agree that it is a deplorable state of affairs when old-age pensioners visit our advice surgeries driven to tears because they do not know how they will cope with the harsh change in their circumstances that has arisen in the past three weeks? Does he agree that this country has a moral obligation to ensure some dignity and comfort in old age and not to squander the nation's money, turning the rich into the super-rich?

Mr. Portillo: That is why I am happy to tell the hon. Lady that we are spending 9·6 per cent. of our gross domestic product on services and benefits to the elderly and that that is the third highest figure in Europe. I hope that she will be well content with that. She will be aware that only a small minority of pensioners were losers under the reforms, and that measures were taken on 27 April to provide further transitional protection to many of those groups.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my hon. Friend agree that to produce that league table would be misleading because it would ignore the fact that there are benefits available to the elderly in this country that are not available anywhere else in the world?

Mr. Portillo: That is indeed the case. Last year the Leader of the Opposition and Lady Castle provided a league table that was discussed with the European Community's statistical office. That office stated that the comparison between the United Kingdom and other countries appeared to have been carelessly done because it was not accompanied by any comment on the fundamental differences between various social protection systems. That same letter of 27 April 1987 went on to say that the only statement that the office could back was that made by my predecessor, my hon. and learned Friend the member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Sir N. Lyell), that the third highest proportion of GDP spent on the elderly was spent in this country.

Mr. Madden: What European example are the British Government following by cutting the pension of a 74-year-old constituent of mine by the amount of industrial death benefit that she receives in respect of her husband who died 22 years ago? Does the Minister agree that it is disgraceful that 30,000 widows should be handicapped because they are in receipt of industrial death benefit and that the Government have not honoured a commitment that they made some time ago that existing recipients would not be harmed by the changes?

Mr. Portillo: We are almost alone among European countries in paying additions to men's benefits in respect of their wives. That is a major feature of our benefit system.

In addition, our supplementary benefit rates for pensioner coupies are about 20 per cent. higher than, for example, those in Germany, after taking account of the differences in the cost of living. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to go into European comparisons, I am happy to do battle with him.

Nurses

8. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from nurses following the pay rise proposals.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the nursing professions at the time of the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of the Government's decision on the pay review body's recommendations. They expressed their satisfaction that the Government had decided to implement the recommendations in full and fully fund the award. The result is that nurses now enjoy the highest ever levels of real terms pay.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend remind nurses how much better off they are under this Government than they were under the Labour Government? Will he also encourage former nurses to return to the profession, in view of the declining number of school leavers?

Mr. Newton: The real terms increase in nurses' pay since 1979 will now be about 44 per cent., which, as with ancillary staff, compares with a real terms reduction under the Labour Administration.

We urge health authorities to encourage former nurses to return to the profession and very much hope that the pay increase will assist that process.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I appreciate the increase in salaries and welcome the fact that it is fully funded, but does the Minister recognise that there has perhaps been an impact on nurses in the hospice movement that has not been considered? Has he received any representations from such sources regarding such an impact? For example, in the Northern Ireland hospice, the outlay each year of £700,000 should be increased by £100,000 if it is to be fair.

Mr. Newton: Yes, I have had at least one direct representation about this matter. I shall consider the point, but I should observe that many hospices are in part funded by health authorities, and it would be appropriate for them to consider the matter in the light of the additional money being made available to them.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently made a most successful visit to Macclesfield, where his words of wisdom about what the Government have done for the Health Service went down very well with a discerning audience? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government's commitment is to meeting the nurses' pay review body award in full, and not just the average increase? There is considerable anxiety among administrators and some nurses that it is just the average increase, rather than the full increase, which the Government have rightly agreed to implement, and which is so welcome.

Mr. Newton: We shall shortly make allocations to regional health authorities in respect of the additional funds. They will have to consider how to allocate to the districts. The general proposition, and the basis on which the figures have been calculated, is a full funding of the award. As for the earlier part of my hon. Friend's question, I am sure that any audience of which he is a part is discerning.

Ms. Harman: Will the Minister give us a clear commitment that he will fund the pay award for nurses in voluntary hospices to the same extent as for those in the NHS? Is he aware that charitable hospices believe that they cannot meet the pay increase by rattling collection boxes and that if pay awards are not fully funded services for the terminally ill will be cut and some hospices, especially in northern England, which do not have a wealthy community to back them, will close?

Mr. Newton: I think that, in effect, I have already answered that question. The hon. Lady puts it in an absurd form. If the Government funded voluntary hospices as they fund health authorities, those hospices would cease to be voluntary, with all that goes with it. Many health authorities, through contractual arrangements or in other ways, assist hospices, and I would expect them to take account of the pay award.

Mr. Watts: Will my right hon. Friend keep an open mind about the possible need to extend regional premiums outside the London area? There is great fear in the East Berkshire authority that, in view of our proximity to London, our existing problems with recruiting nurses will be exacerbated by the premium that is payable just over border.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will know that some thoughts on this subject were put to the review body, but it felt that further consideration was needed on the basis of experience. However, we shall bear that point in mind.

9. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on recruitment levels at schools of nursing.

Mrs. Currie: I understand that in the year 1986-87, 22,825 people entered basic nurse training. At 31 March 1987 there were more than 61,000 learners undertaking basic nurse training in England.

Mr. Wareing: Why do the Government not treat nurse education with the seriousness that it deserves? Why has there been an 18 per cent. cut in expenditure on nurse education by the Government? Is it not a disgrace and a shame that hospitals such as St. Thomas's in London will have no further student recruits this July, which means that they will have to wait until October before they can get more nurses? That will lead to more ward closures or, at the very least, to more bed closures. Is that not a disgrace? Is it not time that the Government pulled their finger out and monitored vacancies to ensure that they are filled?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman might just remember that part of the answer to the first part of his question was given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health in the debate on 19 January, when he said that one of the reasons why basic nurse training costs a little less now is that fewer people drop out, so there is less wastage. As for the hon. Gentleman's point about St. Thomas's, he is obviously not aware of what is happening in Liverpool, which covers his constituency. The Sefton school of nursing tells me that it is fully booked for nurse training and is having no problems with recruitment. The Liverpool school of nursing says that it expects recruitment to be the same this year as last year and that it is experimenting with changing the educational test for admission so that it does not have to rely wholly on people with O-levels. There are many good people without educational qualifications who would make excellent nurses, especially in Liverpool.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: Is my hon. Friend aware of how vital it is to open nursing recruitment to groups other than the young? I refer specifically to people who have brought up their families and who then wish to train for and pursue a second career in their early middle years. I am sure my hon. Friend will appreciate the contribution that they could make to the nursing profession.

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I was making a similar point to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), as such a policy is already being pursued in Liverpool. I am sure that my hon. Friend will join me in welcoming the increasing number of male recruits.

Mr. Galbraith: Does the Minister agree that there is a problem with drop out, particularly in the first year of training? Does she agree also that it may be partly overcome if those recruited into nursing could be confident that the Government would fund the regrading implemented in the nurses' pay award? Will the Minister give a guarantee that any increased expenditure incurred by health boards due to regrading will be fully funded by the Government?

Mrs. Currie: We expect this year's total pay bill for nursing to run to more than £5,000 million for the whole of the United Kingdom, and we have a record number of nurses. Our job is to ensure that we recruit, train and retain all the staff that are needed.

National Health Service

12. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress of the review of the funding and organisation of the National Health Service.

Mr. Moore: We are continuing to examine a range of options for improving services to patients and will bring forward proposals as soon as we can.

Mr. Bennett: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that we on the Government Benches are looking for greater choice for patients in their selection of doctor, treatments and hospitals? We want also to see greater efficiency and value for money in the Health Service, through internal and external competition.

Mr. Moore: I take note not only of what my hon. Friend said, but also of the intent behind it. He is concerned not only about increasing competition, but about improving benefits to patients through greater choice and additional resources in health care.

Mrs. Mahon: Will the Minister take on board the point that his policy, and that of the Government, of increasing competition has led to chaos in my health authority? Laundry is now having to be transported 90 miles to Grimsby and hospitals are regularly without clean linen.

Mr. Moore: Competition has brought £100 million of additional money into health care in England for the benefit of patients. I should have thought that even the unreconstructed Labour Benches could begin to welcome that improvement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: While welcoming my right hon. Friend's review, may I ask whether he is aware that many of us hope that he will pursue an evolutionary rather than a revolutionary approach to the problems? Many of us believe that we continue to have one of the best health services in the world and that the challenges we face are still largely of management rather than of funding.

Mr. Moore: As always, I welcome my hon. Friend's contribution. We are looking at all ideas. Our prime and only concern is the better health of our nation.

Nurses

13. Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how he intends to monitor the implementation of the new clinical grading structure for nurses.

Mr. Newton: By means of guidance from my Department, visits by officials, and returns from all health authorities showing how many staff have been allocated to each of the new grades from each old grade.

Dr. Marek: Will the Minister give a clear and unequivocal assurance that all the money necessary will be found by the Government for health authorities to enable them to staff all established posts, as opposed to all posts currently filled?

Mr. Newton: Health authorities' establishment requirements are for them to determine within the total of their overall resources. We have committed ourselves to providing, and have provided, the additional money required to fund in full the recent pay award.

Mr. Favell: Can my right hon. Friend say when a response will be made to Project 2000? Will he reject proposals to train nurses away from wards? Does he agree that the best learning experience is practical experience?

Mr. Newton: I hope that we will respond to Project 2000 quite shortly. We certainly intend any proposal to ensure that the training of nurses continues to have a strong practical element.

NHS Ancillary Staff (Pay)

14. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress towards a pay award for the National Health Service ancillary staff and how it is to be funded.

15. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress towards a pay award for the National Health Service ancillary staff and how it is to be funded.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to the hon. Members for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) and for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) earlier today.

Mr. Doran: The Minister will be well aware that many of the problems in the Health Service were caused by the Government's failure last year to fund increases. He has spoken about the matter this afternoon, but will he give a commitment that in the event of a shortfall in any health board—and we have heard rumours that there will be such shortfalls—his Department will make up the difference to ensure that there is no knock-on effect on other health services?

Mr. Newton: I do not see how any question of shortfall could arise at a time when negotiations are proceeding on the subject of the hon. Gentleman's question, namely, ancillary staff. We expect that health authorities and boards in Scotland will be able to meet the results of any negotiation out of the resources available to them.

Mr. Ingram: Is the Minister aware that many ancillary workers earn poverty wages below the European guideline on decency levels which are set at £3·25 per hour? Does he agree that that is miserly pay for people who do such a valuable job in the Health Service?

Mr. Newton: I readily recognise that many ancillary workers make an important contribution to the provision of the service as a whole. I have also said—one or two hon. Members may not have heard me say it, so I shall have to say it again—that the wages of that group are higher in real terms than when the Government came to office, and that when the Labour Government left office they were lower in real terms than when they took office.

Hospital Waiting Lists

17. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he is taking to reduce waiting lists at the Eastbourne district general hospital.

Mrs. Currie: In addition to the improvements that we are seeking within existing resources, last year we made an extra £110,000 available to Eastbourne from the waiting list fund. This was used for nearly 100 additional hip operations. This year we have increased the allocation to £155,000, and it will be used for gynaecology and ear, nose and throat patients.

Mr. Gow: Is my hon. Friend aware that for some specialties the waiting lists in Eastbourne are becoming longer, as is the time involved? Does she agree that for a woman to have to wait two years for a hysterectomy is absolutely unacceptable?

Mrs. Currie: My hon. Friend raised these issues in his Adjournment debate on 29 April. I assure him that there has been a good deal of activity in Eastbourne since then. He was then particularly concerned about gynaecology. He has my firm promise that we will get the waiting lists down, and I will write to him in more detail by the end of the week.

AIDS

19. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to promote HIV screening on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him of 12 April, at column 101.

Mr. Butler: My hon. Friend will be aware that the French Government promote voluntary testing and have a large number of regional centres to which they encourage the population to go for such testing. Why have we followed a different course in this country?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be well aware that we have given extensive publicity to the availability of testing and made it very clear in our information material that people who are worried about being infected should seek expert advice. That was made clear, for example, in the leaflet distributed to all households. Of course, if further steps are required we shall be prepared to consider them. My hon. Friend will know that we shall shortly be examining the report from Dr. Joe Smith of the Public Health Laboratory Service on various related issues.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My hon. Friend will be well aware of the concern in large parts of the medical profession that we are not adequately aware of the trend of HIV in this country. I hope that he will seriously consider taking on not only voluntary but compulsory testing where necessary, perhaps in the armed forces or the prison population, so that monitoring of the progress of the virus can be accurate and adequate.

Mr. Newton: I note my hon. Friend's suggestions, but he will know that we have not so far felt it right to go down the path of compulsory testing. There is no doubt that it would raise some substantial issues. Again I refer in part to the report from Dr. Joe Smith, which we shall be studying.

NHS Expenditure (North-West)

20. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on Health Service spending in north-west regional and district health authorities.

Mr. Newton: Gross revenue expenditure has increased from £382·6 million in 1978-79 to £922·8 million in 1986-87. That represents an increase of 24 per cent. in real terms.

During the same period gross expenditure of £277·3 million has also been incurred on completing 32 new capital schemes within the region. With the benefit of that funding record levels of patients have been treated.

Mr. Lloyd: Nevertheless, does the Minister not recognise that there is a history of the health of people in my region being worse than that of people in the more prosperous south-east and that that spending has done nothing to narrow the gap? When will the Government do something serious about the huge health disparities that exist in Britain?

Mr. Newton: I know of the hon. Gentleman's interest in this matter well enough to know that he is aware that the gap has narrowed. The north-west region is a so-called RAWP-gaining region and it has done substantially better than many others for precisely that reason.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Sackville To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the President of Guyana.

Mr. Sackville: Does the Prime Minister agree that critics of the community charge have conspicuously failed to come up with anything better?

The Prime Minister: Yes. Any alternatives would be infinitely worse, as we all know when we have been through a rating revolution. A rating revaluation based on capital values would be even worse, and a local tax would be abhorrent to most people.

Mr. Kinnock: Was not any change that the Prime Minister was to make supposed to be related to the ability to pay?

The Prime Minister: Yes, it is. Nine million people will pay less than the flat rate.

Mr. Kinnock: If that is the case, why is the right hon. Lady having such difficulty persuading her party in this House and the other place?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman did not notice that the Bill went through this House.

Mr. Amery: Has my right hon. Friend had her attention drawn to the practice attributed to President Reagan of consulting an astrologer before taking decisions? Has she considered appointing a resident astrologer at No. 10 Downing street? I should make it plain that I am not applying for the post.

The Prime Minister: No. I come under Libra, which is a very balanced sign.

Q2. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Robertson: Is the Prime Minister aware of the widespread dismay that there will be about the news that the United States Senate has decided to delay ratification of the INF treaty? As the Prime Minister is such a strong public supporter of the treaty, and as she knows of the damaging consequences that there would be for East-West relations if the treaty were to fail, will she use all her influence in Washington to ensure a speedy ratification of it?

The Prime Minister: I share the hon. Gentleman's view that it is important that that treaty be ratified, and I have made that view known. I understand that the Senate postponement relates to United States-Soviet Union differences over interpretation of inspection rights. Among those are rights under the treaty to inspect missiles and missile stages leaving those missile assembly plants subject to permanent monitoring. It is not for us to interpret the treaty, but I believe that there is sufficient time for that to be properly resolved before the President visits Moscow, and I hope that the treaty will be ratified by that time.

Q3. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Derbyshire county council now levies the highest rate in England and Wales, but that none the less, local people in Amber Valley have rejected scare stories about the community charge and elected a Conservative council for the first time ever.

The Prime Minister: Yes. I congratulate my hon. Friend's constituents on having the wisdom to do that. It was important that they should do so, because councils elected now will be those which impose the first community charge. We have to remember that councils decide the community charge.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Has the Prime Minister had time to consider the reply that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment gave me last Tuesday? If so, will she confirm that it is Government policy to employ people on the grounds of merit alone? How does that square with the recent list that was put in the Library in answer to my question about employment in the Civil Service?

The Prime Minister: Of course it is our policy to employ on merit alone. There has never been any other policy.

Q4. Mr. Gill: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gill: In view of the increasing difficulty faced by young people on low incomes in obtaining homes in rural areas, will my right hon. Friend agree to review the allocation of Housing Corporation funds, only 3 per cent. of which go to rural areas, even though 20 per cent. of the population live in those areas?

The Prime Minister: I know that the proportion is very small, but the guidelines covering Housing Corporation allocations to rural areas have recently been revised. Funding will be targeted on smaller and more isolated agricultural settlements, with a view to doubling the present level of housing association provision in those areas. It is not a great deal, but it is a start. As my hon. Friend is very well aware, one also has to get planning permission for increased housing in rural areas.

Q5. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dunnachie: As a result of the recent housing benefit cuts, many senior citizens in my constituency of Glasgow, Pollok and elsewhere have been asked to pay double their previous rent and rates from resources that are already overstretched. Will the right hon. Lady consider ways of ending the fear and hardship that her Government's policy has imposed upon the elderly?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman's constituents are in local authority housing, their rent and rates are a matter for the local authority. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Sir Nicholas Bonsor.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Does my right hon. Friend agree —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This takes up time.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the greatest threats to world peace at the moment is the amount of chemical weapons stored by the Soviet Union? Does she further agree that the use of chemical weapons in the middle east has greatly exacerbated that threat? Is she prepared to take a lead among the leaders of the free world to find a solution to this appalling threat to our future?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that the use of chemical weapons in the Iran-Iraq war has been very worrying indeed, as none had been used since world war I. It concerns us all. I also agree with my hon. Friend that it is a matter of great anxiety to the West that the Soviet Union has a very large stockpile of chemical weapons and has modernised them, whereas we got rid of ours long ago. We shall use all our diplomatic skills to try to get an agreement on chemical weapons, preferably to abolish them altogether, but, as my hon. Friend is aware, verification is the most important factor. I believe that we may get further in negotiations on this matter.

Q6. Miss Lestor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Miss Lestor: I refer the Prime Minister to the absolutely unsympathetic and misleading reply that she gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie), when she tried to put the blame for the change in housing benefit on local authorities. I draw the right hon. Lady's attention to a letter today in The Times from a widow of 89 who worked until she was 75 and who, because her income was 85p over income support level, has had her housing benefit decreased by £1·25. Will the right hon. Lady confirm that that was the Government's intention, so that the poor elderly should subsidise tax cuts for the better off?

The Prime Minister: No. The amount spent on housing benefit now is about £5·3 billion, and every two households are contributing not only to keeping themselves but to keeping a third house. With regard to the recent reforms, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services said:

"We do not think it right to compensate"——

Hon. Members: Reading.

The Prime Minister: Of course I am reading. I am reading precisely what my right hon. Friend said. He said:

"We do not think it right to compensate for those increases in rents introduced to coincide with the new housing benefit scheme, nor increases in rates."—[Official Report, 27 April 1988; Vol. 132, c. 360.]

The new system does not compensate for those latest increases. It offers transitional protection for the system just before then and for the rent and rates then levied.

Q7. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Riddick: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a brand new textile factory is being built in my constituency at a cost of £3 million, without Government subsidy? Is she aware that this is the first new textile factory to be built in the Colne Valley for over half a century? Does my right hon. Friend agree that this is an illustration of the growing confidence of industrialists in Yorkshire and of the success of the Government's economic policies in bringing jobs and prosperity back to the north of England?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the fact that he has a new factory in his area. The textile industry is doing very well. It is effective and competitive. It produces excellent designs and is providing many jobs. As my hon. Friend knows, unemployment is now falling in all areas, including the north-west.

Q8. Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Garrett: Does the right hon. Lady recall that the last question that I put to her was on the subject of litter? The right hon. Lady acted with great alacrity in having a photo-call in St. James's park, which nationally achieved good results. If other hon. Members had done the same in their constituencies, it would have helped the nation to get rid of this curse. Will the right hon. Lady now turn her formidable talents to asking local authorities and the members of the farming community to stop cutting their verges surrounding our countryside? Will she try to persuade the farming community to stop cutting hedges at the same height and width, or we shall finish up with one National Hunt course?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that the landscape that we seek to conserve has largely been created by farming. There was a period when grants were given to take hedges out, but that period has long since ceased. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we do not want a countryside that consists largely of prairies, without many of the old hedges that we used to see.

Mr. Michael Marshall: Is my right hon. Friend aware that this week there are six Chinese parliamentary or Government delegations in London, including the Inter-Parliamentary Union group, which she met earlier today? Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to say what she sees as the present relationship between Her Majesty's Government and the People's Republic of China?

The Prime Minister: I saw a representative of that group today. The relationship between Her Majesty's Government and China is very good. We have the excellent arrangement of the Hong Kong agreement that we signed. Trade is increasing and we wish to increase contacts between the Chinese people and this country. Cultural contacts are also increasing.

Q9. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fearn: Is the Prime Minister aware that the north of England tourist trade needs a boost and that if she visited the Lake district, the Yorkshire dales and north Wales that might help to boost the tourism industry of the north-west?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that tourism creates many jobs and that we wish to increase it. I wish him well in that area.

Mr. Dunnachie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take points of order after the Standing Order No. 20.

Rowntree plc

3.31 pm

Mr. Conal Gregory (York) (by private notice): To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his policy towards the threatened Swiss takeover of Rowntree plc.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Nestlé's bid for Rowntree and Suchard's 29·9 per cent. holding are being considered in the normal way by the Director General of Fair Trading, who, under the Fair Trading Act 1973, is responsible for advising my right hon. and noble Friend on the question of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Gregory: The overwhelming view of shareholders and employees is that Rowntree can best develop as an independent group, and in no way does the offer from Nestlé reflect the value of Rowntree's unique range of international brands. Does the Department of Trade and Industry policy consider the Swiss bid a fair one in terms of free competition? The Swiss group can lower the drawbridge and seize in dawn raids assets built up over many years, returning to an impregnable castle. Is it reasonable to allow a predatory bidder to shelter behind its national law, which enables Swiss companies to insulate themselves against hostile bids?

Secondly, has the Department of Trade and Industry policy differed with regard to 1992, in so far as Rowntree has already got a wide policy towards that date and yet it appears that there is not a Government policy related to the European aspects of that?

I should be very grateful if my right hon. Friend could respond to those questions and the wider employment issues that are at stake in this hostile bid.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for letting the House have his views, as he has let my right hon. and noble Friend and myself have them over the past few days. I am sure that he will continue to do so. My right hon. and noble Friend cannot make a decision about this until he has received the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, who will give his advice as soon as he can about the public interest in this case and the effects on competition in the United Kingdom, in particular.

With due respect to my hon. Friend, I do not think that the price being offered for the shares will be a matter for my right hon. and noble Friend or for the MMC, if any reference is made. The other matters he raised could certainly be relevant and will be considered.

The question whether Rowntree could make a reciprocal bid could be relevant in some circumstances in cases of this kind. I have no doubt that the Director General will consider its relevance in this case. There are, as a general proposition, very many cases in which bids are made and in which the company at the receiving end of the bid is in no position to make a reciprocal bid, against a small private company, for example, or one where the shares are in a few hands.

With regard to 1992, this country, like the other members of the European Community, will be made a much more attractive place for investment. We are expecting a great deal of inward investment to be attracted into the European Community, and we want to see a lot of that coming to this country, both on green field sites and in terms of acquisition. We need not fear a loss to our sovereignty through an inflow of capital because, apart from the Japanese, the British remain the principal outward investors in the world.

This case will be looked at on its merits as a single case. My right hon. and noble Friend will decide what the public interest is once he has received the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, and I am sure that he will consider carefully all the representations of my hon. Friend and those of other hon. Members with an interest.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Is the Minister aware that while his Department dilly-dallies, the City speculates and a major British industry is put at severe risk? Importantly, it is the jobs in the north—in Newcastle, York and Castleford—where we really need them, that are in danger. Is the Minister further aware that the board of the company is beginning to think that it will have to compete with some of the cuts that Nestlé's has threatened, that there is an acute nervousness among the work force up and down the country, and that management and work force want a decision? If they do not have one this week, there may be no decision to make.

Mr. Clarke: My Department and my right hon. and noble Friend are certainly not dilly-dallying; we are complying with the law. The first step is to get the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, who has to be given the time to give sensible and well-considered advice. There is no question of the whole matter being overtaken by events because, for example, were a controlling interest to be acquired in the meanwhile, if a reference were made to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission there would be powers to require a subsequent disinvestment. Therefore, there is no danger of a fait accompli being presented to us all. The fact is that this matter is following its ordinary course.

I understand the uncertainties among the work force. Whenever there is a question of a merger or a takeover, uncertainty is always bad for anybody and unsettles people. There is no immediate and obvious risk to jobs because most people do not think of acquiring companies within the EC in order to move manufacturing and jobs outside the EC. That would be somewhat contradictory. I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear in mind that Nestlé's is already a major investor and employer in Britain, and a welcome one. It employs about 10,000 people, the bulk of them in the north of England and Scotland.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree, however, that if there were to be any question of disinvestment in the future, that would be immensely disruptive, so there is some urgency in the matter in view of the share purchases that are taking place extremely actively at the moment, and that, while the normal procedures have to be followed, they can and should be expedited in this case?

Mr. Clarke: I agree entirely with my right hon. and learned Friend. Plainly, everybody wants the uncertainty brought to an end as quickly as possible and any subsequent order to disinvest could be disruptive. We are awaiting the advice, of the Director General of Fair Trading, who has had the matter in his hands for only the last week. I am sure that he appreciates the urgency of putting forward advice, and my right hon. and noble Friend will respond as quickly as possible. The matter should be sorted out within a reasonable time.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Minister aware that I have a constituency interest because Rowntree's Gray Dunn factory is located in Glasgow and there is apprehension there, as elsewhere, about the employment implications of any takeover? The Minister mentioned new investment in the United Kingdom, but what is involved here is not new investment but a straight takeover. It is another case of a foreign competitor attempting to swallow up a major British company. It will be completely unacceptable if that is allowed to happen without a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Clarke: I have already said that I understand how worrying such uncertainty is for people who work for a major company. That is why I have just agreed with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) that we all wish to see a decision arrived at as quickly as possible, but that has to be as quickly as the law allows, given the need to wait for the advice of the Director General.

Leaving aside this case, I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's broad proposition about foreign predators taking over British companies. The British economy benefits from the fact that we are open and welcoming to inward investment. We also benefit greatly from the outward investment. The Labour party can never make up its mind. When there is British investment overseas it says that jobs are being exported, and when there is investment in Britain it says that wicked foreigners are taking over our firms. The right hon. Gentleman might work on the Swiss trade unions to see whether they will agree with his party and start complaining to the Swiss about the export of jobs.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): In considering the representations, will my right hon. and learned Friend take seriously the concern which has been expressed by many of my constituents in Norwich, North who work in the Rowntree factory in Norwich? Will he consider carefully the representations which have been made to him today and earlier about possible reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and, indeed, about the asymmetry between the position in Switzerland and that in this country?

Mr. Clarke: I can assure my hon. Friend, as I have assured hon. Members on both sides, that we certainly will. Obviously we must have a decision as quickly as possible about where the public interest lies. As I have said, differences between Swiss law and British patent law may be relevant in some circumstances, although with many takeover bids there is no prospect of a reciprocal bid by the company at the receiving end.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Is it not a fact that if a British company chose to make a bid for Nestlés, the Swiss Government would block it, and that if the takeover goes ahead it will not be reversible? Will the Minister make it clear that the takeover of Rowntree involves not just a loss of jobs in the north of England but the loss of a corporate headquarters, and that regional policy demands that corporate headquarters should be retained in the regions? Should not that be a factor to be taken into account by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Clarke: I will check, but I think that the hon. Gentleman's view on Swiss law is wrong. I do not think that the Swiss Government would step in to stop any takeover. There are curious features in Swiss law which restrict the ability of foreign companies to buy Swiss companies when the Swiss company is hostile. So far, I have been able to trace more British acquisitions of companies in Switzerland than Swiss acquisitions of companies in Britain in 1987.

All this is leading to, not a decision on my part—because I do not take it—nor by my right hon. and noble Friend but simply a request to the House to understand that the legal position is that we must consider this case on its merits and decide what the public interest is. My right hon. and noble Friend will decide that as quickly as he can once he has the advice of the director general.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): My right hon. and learned Friend should not be stampeded into a decision on this important matter. Is he aware that Nestlé has its headquarters in Croydon? As he rightly says, it is a very good employer, employing more than 10,000 people in this country. Does he agree that the amount of overseas investment that our industrialists have made overseas, particularly in America and Europe, has not only boosted the invisible earnings of this country but has also given us an entree into the export markets of other countries? Does he agree that it would be a great mistake to hamper the mobility of investment because that is the only way to keep the economy strong?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend has made an authoritative and clear statement on the principles that should guide us and on the benefits which flow from an open investment policy, subject to the provisions of the fair trading legislation which will have to apply in this case. He has also identified the headquarters of the company; that will solve a mystery for a large number of people. Most of my constituents thought that the company was called "Nessalls" and did not realise that it was a foreign company until the fuss suddenly arose.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Is the Minister aware that some of us, with significant numbers of employees of Cadbury Schweppes plc in our constituencies, have been written to by Sir Adrian Cadbury, who has pointed out that not only may irreversible decisions be taken about Rowntree, which concerns us much in Yorkshire, but possibly similar decisions about Cadbury——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about Rowntree.

Mr. Rees: I know that it is in Croydon, but Cadbury is in my constituency.

Mr. Speaker: The private notice question is about Rowntree, not Cadbury.

Mr. Clarke: If chocolate is encompassed vaguely by the exchange, Mr. Speaker, I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that my right hon. and noble Friend decided this morning not to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission the General Cinema stake in Cadbury because there seems to be no threat to competition or to the national interest in that bid. That is a coincidence. Apart from the fact that both companies make chocolate, there is no link between them. The two cases will be considered and decided on separately. The decision on Rowntree will be made when we have received the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is not the key fact in all this the information that my right hon. and learned Friend gave the House earlier—that after nine years of rising overseas investment, the United Kingdom is now the second largest overseas investor after Japan? Should we not think carefully before taking action that might prove wholly counter-productive, leading possibly to an international investment protection war?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. Nothing could be more absurd than the general proposition that British capital should not be invested in foreign firms, or that foreigners should not be allowed to invest here. That would do a great deal of damage. On the other hand, the British Government must look after the national interest by determining what is the public interest in a particular case and what is the effect on competition in the British and European market of any proposed merger. That is what we shall do in each case, without being guided by national prejudice.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that I have a constituency interest in an area that has lost its major industry—mining? The Rowntree factory in my constituency is one of the major employers, and the vast majority of the work force there are very concerned.

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman also aware that, at a meeting last night, the chairman of Nestlé failed to give any guarantee that there would not be job losses? If he cannot give such a guarantee to the director general, and if jobs will be lost, is that against the public interest, and will the Minister refer the case to the MMC?

Mr. Clarke: All these comments will be borne in mind by those who have to advise and then take the decision. As I have said, it should not be automatically assumed that there is a threat to jobs in any particular bid—certainly not jobs in general. There have been large job losses in acquisitions and mergers between British companies in this country. All companies, regardless of ownership, have to make sure that they make and keep themselves cost-effective in the European market in the sort of goods we are talking about. The Government must encourage the freest possible movement of capital, but make sure that the public interest is not being threatened by any acquisition, from whatever source.

Mr. Michael Heseltine (Henley): Is my right hon. and learned Friend satisfied that the guidelines issued to the monopoly and mergers operations are now sufficient to relate to the target of 1992, by when the European market is scheduled to be completed? Will he agree that in any revision of any guidelines we need to be concerned with fairness in the market place? It is very hard to square fairness to compete within the market place with the fact that British companies can be acquired by Swiss companies but it is difficult for the reverse process to take place.

Mr. Clarke: We have just issued a recent document on monopolies and mergers policy, which I am sure my right hon. Friend has seen. We are always open to proposals that it should be revised. The powers that we retain are the broadest possible and necessary ones to look after the public interest as, in the end, my right hon. and noble Friend determines it. It is an inevitable consequence—and, in my opinion, a desirable one—of 1992 that there will be an increase in the flow of inward investment into this country. Indeed, we shall be competing for the largest possible share of that inward investment with the other 11 Community members.

The position vis-à-vis reciprocity and Switzerland can be relevant in some circumstances. However, it is arguable that it is the Swiss who are imposing a burden upon themselves by, to a certain extent, closing their market as a result of second world war legislation. No one wants to introduce similar legislation in this country: it would cut out desirable inward flows of investment.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Does the Minister appreciate that the consideration of jobs is paramount in towns such as mine, which is the home of Quality Street? Does he realise that Rowntree has been an integral part of the community, as well as Mackintosh? The regeneration of my town is built around the Civic Trust initiative, which incorporates Quality Street, so will he give an early decision on this? The anxiety felt by the employees of Rowntree in Halifax is unbelievable. They have already gone through the trauma of the early 1980s, when the work force was cut by 1,500. There is real fear in Halifax that we could lose our last large private employer.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Lady correctly expresses the anxiety that is undoubtedly felt in Halifax. I can assure her that it is appreciated by my right hon. and noble Friend and everyone involved in the decision. I agree with her that we need the quickest possible end to the present uncertainty. The general fear that this automatically leads to job losses should not be unnecessarily aroused; nor need the reference to an overseas company alarm people when they realise that it is based in Croydon and is the owner of such well-known names as Crosse and Blackwell and such British products as Branston pickle. Therefore, there is room for a broad economic and public interest judgment to be made in this case, and there is no need for needless fears to be roused excessively at this stage.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I recognise that the Office of Fair Trading needs time, but may I encourage my right hon. and learned Friend to get the director general to burn a little midnight oil, because he is taking rather a long time to come to a decision about a contentious bid? In such contentious bids, is there not a case for examining the legal position to see whether we can change the system whereby predatory trading can continue on the stock exchange while the Office of Fair Trading is considering a matter?

Mr. Clarke: I shall draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of the director general, although I think that he is being a little severe. If the director general has had the offer for over a week, it is for only a little over a week, and I am sure that he appreciates the need to give advice as soon as he reasonably can; but he must study the matter. I have already said that any trading on the stock exchange does not exclude, if necessary, the exercise of the necessary powers in the end if, after reference, it is proved to be contrary to the public interest. The recent reference of the Kuwaiti acquisition in BP was after the acquisition of a substantial number of shares. It does not bind the hands of those who ultimately have to decide what to do in the light of any ruling from the Commission.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Does the Minister realise that there are 13,000 employees who are extremely concerned about this? Does he realise that the brands are very similar, so if the merger goes ahead rationalisation is bound to take place? Is he not taking a cavalier view of the Swiss legislation? If Rowntree cannot make a bid for Nestlé, the same should apply in this country. Does not the Minister realise that if the bid for Cadbury Schweppes goes ahead, along with that for Rowntree, 90 per cent. of our chocolate confectionery production will be owned by American or Swiss interests? Does not that concern him?

Mr. Clarke: I hope that I have made it clear that I entirely share the concern. The law does not allow me to announce any decision on the part of my right hon. and noble Friend. It would not be right for my right hon. and noble Friend to reach a decision, which he has not, until he has the advice of the director general. As I have said, the main purpose of acquisition by, say, Japanese companies in this country is not to move employment abroad but to provide a base for manufacturing and employment in this country. I am merely making propositions that stop people raising needless fears about foreigners buying our companies. I am a little cavalier about Swiss legislation because I am a British legislator, not a Swiss legislator, and it is not within my power to reform the law of Switzerland.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that as the Nestlé company is mainly a grocery company and Rowntree is mainly a confectionery company there is no clash of interests? Is he also aware that the Nestlé company has operated in this country for over 120 years and is the employer of more than 10,000 people here?

Mr. Clarke: I am aware of that, which is why I am relieved that nobody has yet demanded that Nestlé disinvest itself of what it already has, or shed the employment in this country. My hon. Friend has made some valid points, which no doubt will be considered along with the counter-points that some of my hon. Friends have made before my right hon. and noble Friend eventually makes his decision.

Mr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): What does the term "public interest" imply when the Minister uses it in this context? Does it imply the regional policy considerations that have been mentioned, or is it a much broader based appreciation, and not the kind of strange English nationalism which we have seen as part of the debate in the House and in the media?

Mr. Clarke: "The public interest" is, fortunately, a broad brush description and no doubt it could, if necessary, be used to encompass almost any decision that one pleased. However, Governments cannot act arbitrarily, so we have issued guidelines about the basis on which we think decisions should be taken in these matters. I commend the recent publication on monopolies and mergers to the hon. Gentleman, and he will see that it is free of English nationalist or any other prejudice of the kind that he fears.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): I declare an interest as I had 19 years' employment with Rowntree. I fully understand the point that my right hon. and learned Friend has made about the difficulty of arriving at any view until proper consideration has been given to the matter. Will he recognise, in his comments about reciprocity between Swiss investment and that in the United Kingdom, that a hostile bid in Switzerland would be blocked? There can certainly be agreed investment—that is no problem. Insofar as the Rowntree company has had two predatory investments made by Swiss companies, both of which are regarded as hostile, the situation is clearly unfair. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, in regard to his 1992 campaign to provide a base within which the United Kingdom can take its full share of the European opportunity, such hostile bidding under present conditions is little short of uncompetitive?

Mr. Clarke: I know that my right hon. Friend made his career in Rowntree before he came to the House. He is well informed about the company, and I understand that he is also well informed about Swiss law. He states the position accurately. The points he made about fairness, which were also made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), are relevant in some circumstances. That is one of the principal matters that the director general is considering, and on which we shall have to reflect when we get his advice.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): Does the Minister realise that at the very least a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission allows some pause for scrutiny and for the public interest considerations to be examined? Will he accept that we are not talking only about one company; we are talking about the future of an entire region and whether Rowntree remains one of the few independent companies based in the north? Does he know that more than 12,000 people are employed in the company, and is it not high time that the views of the thousands of people who work for the company are held in as much account as those of a score of institutional power brokers in the City of London? Does he agree that, in the event of a hostile bid, Swiss law does not allow a reciprocal bid in the same way as it is allowed under British law?

Does the Minister realise that, as we are now in the run-up to 1992 and we are starting to see the profound pervasive impact of that in every area of industry and commerce, and as in the past two years nearly 70 Euro-mergers have taken place across the frontiers of Europe, this decision will mark a watershed in Government policy? When will the Government understand the critical importance of a coherent industrial policy for Britain which does not put the folly of the free market before the interests of the nation?

Mr. Clarke: First, I disagree with the hon. Gentleman that a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission would provide a pause. We have to decide whether to refer the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Many hon. Members who have taken part in these exchanges have pointed out the need to end uncertainty as soon as possible, so a decision is required on whether to refer the matter in the public interest. It is no good putting it off. Delay would be considerably unsettling.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the views of employees, and among all the considerations that we shall take into account obviously my right hon. and noble Friend will have regard to the views that have been put forward today by those hon. Members who represent the employees of the company. All that will be relevant to the consideration that we have to make as quickly as possible.

I shall not repeat what I have already said about 1992, but I think that the hon. Gentleman must think through what he means by 1992. In the run-up to 1992 it will be more difficult, not less difficult, to take a closed, little England view of outward investment, or inward investment into this country. It will be a long and difficult task, but I would commend to Opposition Members a little thinking through of the opportunities of 1992, and the change in the economic climate that 1992 will produce.

For that reason, I do not accept that this is a watershed decision for the future of industrial strategy. That would mean that we should all be seized with excitement about whether it is right or wrong for foreigners to own our chocolate companies. It is an extremely important decision from the point of view of those who work in the chocolate industry, the consumers and the national economy. It will have to be taken dispassionately on the best advice that we can get and it will be taken by my right hon. and noble Friend when he has the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have carefully noted those hon. Members who have not been called. Perhaps there will be a further opportunity tomorrow to discuss this subject during Trade and Industry questions, and I shall bear them very much in mind.

William Calvert

3.59 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of the Northern Ireland Office to permit William Calvert out on parole from prison to attend his father's funeral."

The matter is specific and important. This prisoner has almost finished serving his sentence. Next month he will be out on parole. Unfortunately for him and his family, his father died very suddenly. An application was made to the Northern Ireland Office for parole so that he could attend his father's funeral. The Northern Ireland Office sat on that application and did not take a decision until this morning, although the funeral is to take place this afternoon.

It is terrible that the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley), who is seldom in the Province of Northern Ireland, who is obsessed with his own safety when he is in Nothern Ireland and who has no concern, on humanitarian grounds, for a sorrowing family, did not have the decency to inform the family yesterday that young Calvert would not be released. I fail to understand why a prisoner who is to be paroled next month is not to be allowed out of prison to attend his father's funeral.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) seeks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of the Northern Ireland Office to permit William Calvert out on parole from prison to attend his father's funeral."

I have listened with concern to what the hon. Member has said, but he well knows that I have to decide whether applications under Standing Order No. 20 should take precedence over the orders set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that I do not find that his application meets the criteria under Standing Order No. 20. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

4.2 pm

Mr. Jimmy Dunnachie (Glasgow, Pollok): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Due to the inaccurate and misleading answer that the Prime Minister gave me today, is there nothing in Standing Orders to ensure that she should give more realistic and truthful answers to Members' questions? The housing benefit cuts are the responsibility of this Government, not of local government.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman may possibly be right, but that is not a matter for me. I understand that he is dissatisfied with that answer, but I cannot help him because it is not a matter of order. If the question is asked again—and there will be other opportunities to raise it—the hon. Member may receive a different answer.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may be that you have been ill advised, as we all are from time to time, but bearing in mind the importance of the confectionery industry in my constituency, easily the biggest employer, and bearing in mind——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know it is difficult.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: No, it is not difficult; it is disgraceful.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Member's frustration, but he may have another opportunity tomorrow to ask questions about this subject, if he behaves himself.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to refer to a general principle of the constitution—indeed, a convention of the constitution.

The exchanges on the private notice question demonstrated how important it is that the Secretary of State should make the decision. You consider that issues should be raised on the Floor of the House, but we were unable to question the person who is legally obliged to make decisions because the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is in the other place. I should be grateful for your advice on how hon. Members can bring their influence to bear so that, when statements such as the one that has been made, today are made we get the organ grinder, not the monkey, and we can question the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member knows that that is not a matter for me. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is also a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister found that under pressure she had inadvertently misled the House and sought your permission under Standing Orders to make a statement to correct what she had said, would you be able to provide time to allow her to do that later today?

Mr. Speaker: Any personal statement has to be cleared with me, but I am not certain that suggestions would be appropriate.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that in another lengthy written answer to a question from the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) the Prime Minister used these words:

"housing benefit has been changed".—[Official Report, 6 May 1988; Vol. 132, c. 634.]

Given that the Prime Minister outlined what she said were her achievements, that does not seem to be consistent with the reply that she gave this afternoon to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie). Taking into account your excellent interview at the weekend——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us not go into that, please. What is the point of order for me today? I believe the answer to the question was on Friday, not at the weekend.

Mr. Clarke: I thank you for what you have just said, Mr. Speaker, but, given that you want there to be an excellent relationship between Parliament and the people, do you accept that that also includes local government? If the Government are making it difficult for local authorities by blaming them for something with which they have had absolutely nothing to do, is it not right that you should give us your guidance on the possibility of a parliamentary debate?

Mr. Speaker: I am responsible for questions of order in the House. I cannot be held to be responsible for questions on the Order Paper, and certainly not for the answers that are given to them. That is a matter for parliamentary debate. Hon. Members must find parliamentary opportunities to raise these matters. I cannot deal with them.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I heard what the Prime Minister had to say. On Saturday I heard about 30 constituents complaining about the same matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) referred.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have just replied to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). I, too, have constituency surgeries, but I cannot answer his question. That is not my responsibility.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie) and for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin), is it not deplorable that the Prime Minister is so parsimonious with the truth that she prefers to——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already said that hon. Members must find parliamentary opportunities to deal with matters of that kind. They must not seek to debate them through the Chair.

Takeovers and Mergers (Employment Protection)

4.7 pm

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require consultation by employers with employees before any takeovers and mergers of companies.

It is appropriate that I should bring this proposed Bill before the House, particularly after the debate on Rowntree. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) complained that the answers about Rowntree were given by the monkey rather than by the organ grinder. I notice that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has departed, although this is a Bill about takeovers and mergers and employees' rights. So the monkey is not even here to listen to what I have to say about my Bill. The employees—there were 500,000 of them last year who were affected by it—will take note of the absence from the Front Bench of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on a matter as important as this.

The Government rely solely on competition when considering takeovers and mergers. Competition, when protecting British companies, is like having an igloo in the Sahara. By allowing mergers and takeovers to continue unbridled, the Government have created a casino capitalism which is good for the predator, the speculator and the insider trader—although they came a little unstuck over the Guinness and Distillers takeover—but which is bad for Britain, for the economy, for employment and for the consumer.

For instance, last year, expenditure on takeovers and mergers was £15·4 billion. Takeovers affected 500,000 jobs, yet, there was only £10 billion investment in manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom. That figure was still 10 per cent. below the 1979 figure. Overseas investment, which is close to the Government's heart, represented £17·8 billion. There is something wrong in the portals of the City if people can find money for takeovers, mergers and overseas investment, but cannot find money for investment in this country.

Let us consider some of the mergers that have been contemplated. For example, there was the attempted takeover by BTR, which was a rusty bucket company, and of Pilkington's, one of our few world leaders in flat glass, which spent money on research and development and had its headquarters and plants in the United Kingdom; indeed, it had its headquarters in my region. That takeover was prevented only by the opposition of the employees, the trade unions and the local authorities in that area. There was no support from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who refused to refer it to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

There has been another recent takeover attempt in my constituency—the bid by Blue Circle Cement for Birmid Qualcast, which is one of the last of our producers of consumer durables and a world leader in the manufacture of cookers and lawn mowers. That company saw off the foreign competition, yet it could have been taken over by Blue Circle, which has no expertise in the manufacture of consumer durables. That takeover was prevented only by a recount of votes, involving a few thousand votes out of many millions, yet the company could have found itself with management that has no expertise in engineering.

We have already discussed this afternoon the attempted takeover of Rowntree by Nestlé. A hostile bid could not take place in Switzerland because of the legislation, but the foreign predator may come over here and take over a successful company. It wants to do that because it has not been able to get into Europe. It wants to buy the brand names and close down many of the plants. It is also disgraceful that the bid for Cadbury by General Cinema has not been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Once again, one of our leading companies faces the possibility of a foreign takeover.

I am concerned about the employees. The views of shareholders, even absentee shareholders, are taken into account. The views of the "hands off" financial institutions are taken into account, although they may have shares in both companies. However, the views of the company employees are not taken into account, yet those people have built up the company, created the wealth of the company. Their future and that of their families lies with the company. They are sold off with the company like cattle. It is time that that ceased.

That is why I am seeking to introduce this Bill. The employees or the trade unions representing the employees should be consulted at least 30 days before a bid is finalised. In addition, the company making the bid should justify that bid to the employees and the trade unions. The company should state its future plans, its future employment prospects and what will happen to the plants of the company that is being taken over. It must say whether it will remain a United Kingdom company, whether it will carry out research and development in this country and whether it will conduct sales from this country. An application by the employees or the trade unions for a meeting with one or both companies should be granted within 14 days, as of right. If the companies fail to comply with those conditions, the Secretary of State would block the bid.

I am asking for nothing outrageous. This is an extremely modest Bill. Similar conditions already apply in the Netherlands, where employees are consulted in this way before any bid can go ahead. The Government's consideration of such bids, purely on the basis of competition, is far too narrow. What about the consumer interest and the national interest? What about the effect on the manufacturing base of this country? All those criteria should be taken into account before any bid is allowed.

I wish to make this country less of a haven for the predator, the speculator and the insider trader. I want to protect the employee, the consumer and Britain's manufacturing base. Above all, I want the national interest to be taken into account. I have pleasure in presenting the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Doug Hoyle, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Ernie Ross, Mr. Robert N. Wareing, Mr. Frank Cook, Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. James Lamond, Mr. Joseph Ashton and Mr. Michael J. Martin.

TAKEOVERS AND MERGERS (EMPLOYMENT PROTECTION)

Mr. Doug Hoyle accordingly presented a Bill to require consultation by employers with employees before any takeovers and mergers of companies: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 July and to be printed. [Bill 163.]

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Clauses Nos. 22, 23, 26 to 28, 31, 42, 49, 91, 98, 127 and 128 and Schedule No. 7.

Considered in Committee. [Progress 9 May.]

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Ordered,

That the order in which the remaining proceedings in Committee of the whole House on the Finance (No. 2) Bill are to be taken shall be Clause 91, Schedule 7, Clause 127, Clause 128, Clause 42.—[Mr. Brooke.]

Clause 91

ASSETS HELD ON 31ST MARCH 1982

4.15 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 75, line 16, leave out '1982' and insert '1974'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 14, in page 75, line 20, leave out '1982' and insert '1974'.

Mr. Brown: With the leave of the Committee, I shall seek to withdraw amendment No. 13. However, the Committee is entitled to a brief explanation of the reason. We tabled the amendment, not because we believed——

The Chairman: Order. It might be better if the hon. Gentleman were to speak to the amendment and then ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw it.

Mr. Brown: I shall do precisely that. The insertion of the date 1974 does not set out the Labour party's ultimate response to the Government's proposals. We hoped that the amendment would be a device whereby we could have discussed matters of substance on the Floor of the House first, before the Committee moved on to discuss other amendments, particularly those in respect of line 38 which are matters of detail that should have been more properly discussed in Committee. However, I understand that the Government wish to discuss matters of principle in a clause stand part debate. It would be rather odd, therefore, if Opposition Members were to speak to the amendment while Conservative Members spoke in the clause stand part debate. It would be for the Committee's convenience to have just the one debate and, to help the Committee in that respect, I shall seek to withdraw my amendment.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should first put the Question to the Committee and then come back to the hon. Gentleman.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): In view of the spirit of the speech made by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), I shall not delay the Committee long, but my hon. Friends would not wish me to let this moment pass without drawing attention to 1974, the date that the Opposition selected as the fulcrum of their amendment. It shows either, in the case of the dog, a return to his vomit or——

Mr. Nicholas Brown: With the greatest respect, this is not in the spirit of what I have just said.

Mr. Brooke: —it is a return to one of the greater moments of the Labour party. I remember that 1974 was the year in which I opposed the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) in his former constituency.

I would be the last to suggest that the inflation engendered by the Labour Government of 1974 was of a quality such as that which brought down the Roman empire, and which is recorded in the pages of Suetonius and Gibbon, but——

Mr. Nicholas Brown: This is most ungracious. There was no capital gains tax in the Roman empire. This cannot possibly be relevant.

Mr. Brooke: I am concluding my remarks. It would not be right to let this moment pass without drawing attention to the date that the Opposition selected. I am only sorry that they will not have a chance to develop their reasons for selecting it.

The Chairman: The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) has already sought leave to withdraw the amendment. Does he have the leave of the Committee to withdraw the amendment?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I beg to move Amendment No. 15, in page 75, line 16, after '31st March 1982' insert

'or which was acquired after 31st March 1982 with any chargeable gain arising on the corresponding disposal being held over under section 79 of Finance Act 1980 or rolled over under section 115 of the Capital Gains Act 1979.'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 5, in page 75, line 38, at end insert—

'(5) Where in the case of a disposal of assets which were acquired after 31st March 1982—

(a) the person making the disposal had acquired the assets by applying the proceeds from a disposal before 6th April 1988 or other assets which he held on 31st March 1982 or had disposed of before 31st March 1982 and the consideration for that acquisition was reduced under section 115(1)(b) of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, or

(b) the person making the disposal had acquired the assets before 6th April 1988 from another person who held the assets on 31st March 1982 and the consideration for that acquisition was reduced under section 79(1) of the Finance Act 1980, it shall be assumed that on acquisition those assets were sold by the person making the disposal, and immediately reacquired by him, at their market value on that date.'.

No. 7, in page 75, line 38, at end insert—

'(4A) Where in the case of a disposal of assets which were acquired after 31st March 1982—

(a) the person making the disposal had acquired the assets by applying the proceeds from a disposal before 6th April 1988 of other assets which he held on 31st March 1982 or had disposed of before 31st March 1982 and the consideration for that acquisition was reduced under section 115(1)(b) of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979; or

(b) the person making the disposal had acquired the assets before 6th April 1988 from another person who held the assets on 31st March 1982 and the consideration for that acquisition was reduced under section 79(1) of the Finance Act 1980

it shall be assumed, if the taxpayer so elects, that on acquisition those assets were sold by the person making the disposal, and immediately reacquired by him, at their market value on the day of acquisition.'.

Mr. Butterfill: I congratulate the Government on their proposal to rebase capital gains tax to 1982. It is an excellent decision and it will be widely welcomed in the business community, having regard to the enormously damaging inflation that took place before that time and the fact that gains which accrued arose largely out of inflation rather than any real gain.

There is, however, an anomaly here. Chargeable transactions that took place between April 1982 and April 1986 will be taxed retrospectively on the gain which occurred before 1982 if the gain was deferred through roll-over relief. Perhaps my hon. Friend did not intend that to happen. I hope that, if he did intend it, he might reconsider the point. It seems rather unfair that people who legitimately took advantage of roll-over relief should have the base of their gains taken back to 1965, whereas all other gains will be rebased at 1982.

I simply ask my hon. Friend the Paymaster General whether there is any possibility of his reconsidering the matter.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). There is an anomaly here. Like him, I welcome the change of date to 1982. The high rate of inflation from which we suffered occurred before 1979-80, so capital gains tax had become a tax on inflation. I should have thought that all fair-minded people would welcome the 1982 valuation.

A person who acquired an asset in 1970, for example, and sold it after 1982 with roll-over relief will find that the roll-over provision is now ignored in regard to the capital cost of the asset. If somebody sold an asset, such as a farm, and there was no roll-over relief, he would have paid CGT at 30 per cent. With roll-over relief, however, the rate is bound to be 40 per cent. That is a second anomaly.

A third anomaly, which I am sure my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did not intend, has been drawn to my attention by the Historic Houses Association. It involves the maintenance fund for heritage property. If roll-over relief is not allowed, the fund will pay at 35 per cent.

Will my hon. Friend reconsider this matter? I do not suggest for a moment that my amendment is worded correctly, but perhaps he will re-examine the matter to see whether the anomaly can be ironed out. If the Bill must stay as it is, I do not think that the rate of CGT should exceed 30 per cent., for a rate higher than that would create some hardship.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): I commend the spirit of the amendment, and my own. Although the amendments were drafted in different places, they seem to have come to almost the same wording.

This matter was drawn to my attention by the National Farmers Union. The value of land rose sharply, almost as soon as capital gains tax was introduced in 1965, until 1982, since when it has virtually plateaued. Many farmers, especially those who have made partial disposals or changed farms, rather as other business men may have exchanged assets, perhaps as part of an expansion scheme, will find that they are caught.

Retrospection always surfaces in Finance Bills. I agree that there is no perfect solution. I remember spending many years going into Finance Bills trying to work out formulae for what was retrospective, what was retroactive and what was merely unfortunate. Here, however, if an asset holder disposed of his property before 1982, he would be liable to capital gains tax, but those who disposed of an asset between 1982 and the Budget would have received at least indexation relief for any gains after 1982 and they would have known the situation that applied.

People with roll-over, however, and no anticipation of what would happen, let alone the fact that they now come into a higher rate of tax, are caught retrospectively and, I hope, accidentally. The Treasury Bench may want to say something about the welcome improvements that have been made in retirement relief. In extremis, one can always die and avoid the tax that way, but there are people who will be caught.

I declare a personal interest, not least because I happen to be my own constituent. Although my circumstances are not confined to me, they illustrate the extreme unfairness of the present arrangement. My family purchased a farm in 1967 so, for practical purposes, we are virtually contemporary with CGT. A motorway is being constructed across the farm. In January, I had notice to treat on a portion of my land, which is being taken. That pre-dated the Budget and falls within the spirit of my comments about the past. Unfortunately, on the second and larger portion of the take, we received a compulsory purchase order on, if my memory is correct, 19 March 1988.

There was therefore an enforced disposal which took place after the Budget, which could not avail itself of the relief that would have taken effect on or after 6 April.

I cannot believe that any sane or properly advised person would have conceived of disposing of their property in those circumstances. Making a more general point, it merely instances the way in which compulsory purchase orders still give rise to resentment and to an extreme case of the anomaly. I would not have dreamt of mentioning that example had there not been the broad and general issue to consider, and one is entitled to return to it.

There are people who have acted in good faith. They have moved from one farm to another, or from one business to another, and the value of their assets has expanded. Only in the case of those who happened to have different assets acquired after 1982 with roll-over or in special circumstances such as those I have mentioned—where I would, in essence, have to acquire an asset in order to roll over to it—would such difficulties arise. I commend the amendments to the Committee and invite the Treasury Bench to think again.

4.30 pm

Mr. Brooke: Amendment No. 15, moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), seeks to give the benefit of rebasing where tax has been deferred on the occasion of a gift or the replacement of business assets between 1982 and 1988. Unlike amendment No. 5, spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), and amendment

No. 7, spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), amendment No. 15 does not appear to involve exempting the whole deferred gain. However, it does not spell out what it would do instead. If my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West will allow me, I will turn to amendments Nos. 5 and 7.

The amendments of my hon. Friends the Members for Daventry and for Croydon, South relate to situations where, under the Bill, the benefit of rebasing will not be available. The approach in the Bill is that rebasing will apply where, after 5 April 1988, the taxpayer disposes of an asset which he held in 1982 or acquired by a no-gain, no-loss transfer from someone who held it then. However, rebasing will not be available where, between 1982 and 1988, tax was deferred under the provisions for gifts and for replacement of business assets. That is because the taxpayer would be disposing of an asset which he acquired after 31 March 1982.

There are arguments of principle both ways. On the one hand, there is the argument underlying the approach in the Bill, which is the comparison with people who in the same circumstances opted not to defer tax between 1982 and 1988. They will have paid tax on their full gains at the time without the benefit of rebasing. It is questionable whether those who deferred paying tax should benefit compared with those who paid their tax at the time. The opposite argument, which underlies the amendments, is that the full benefit of rebasing will be available where the tax deferral took place before 31 March 1982. Therefore, to give no benefit from rebasing, where the deferral was between 1982 and 1988, could be seen as a little harsh.

However, my hon. Friends' amendments would be unjustifiably generous. They would exempt from tax the whole of the gain deferred between 1982 and 1988 and not just the pre-1982 component. The deferred gain will often contain a large post-1982 element and it would be wrong to exclude it from tax. To do so would be unfair to the majority of capital gains tax payers who, when disposing of assets acquired before 1982, would have their post-1982 gains taxed in full. There is no reason to exempt the post-1982 gain.

As to whether the pre-1982 gain should be exempted, there would frequently be acute difficulties in trying to identify precisely the pre-1982 component in the deferred gain. Even in the most straightforward case, the necessary records may no longer be available. Many cases will not be straightforward. It would be necessary to cater, for example, for the situation where a business asset sold in 1983 was subsequently replaced by a number of replacement assets, some of which have since been sold, others replaced, and some still owned by the taxpayer. Trying to unscramble all that in an attempt to identify the precise pre-1982 component in any deferred gain still in charge would involve long and complicated rules and impose a major burden of compliance on taxpayers. It would also be impossible to observe if, as would often be the case, records were not complete.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I am following the Minister's remarks with interest. In order to extend my knowledge of these matters, can he say how much it would cost the Government to accept his hon. Friend's proposals?

Mr. Brooke: I will, if I may, return to that matter later.

Mr. Boswell: If I may follow through the argument advanced by my right hon. Friend concerning the difficulties of computing the pre-1982 component, I readily concede that it would add another line to the calculation. However, in certain cases assets would have to be valued back to their more speculative 1965 values. If that can be calculated in principle, why cannot the 1982 value also be calculable?

Mr. Brooke: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but perhaps I may continue with the point that I was adducing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry will appreciate that there are real difficulties. If anything needs to be done, it must be made simpler and much more practicable. The amendments of my hon. Friend avoid those practical difficulties simply by excluding the whole of any deferred gain from tax. As I have said, that goes too far. I may say, in reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), that the figure he seeks is essentially unquantifiable but, on the basis of my hon. Friend's amendments, the cost could be up to £50 million. In any event, the amendments go too far and would often exempt from tax large real gains made since 1982. At the same time, the amendments would give no benefit where there has been a succession of deferrals between 1982 and 1988—for example, where a business asset had been replaced by another asset which had itself been replaced.

I have listened carefully to the points made by my hon. Friends, and between now and Report I shall consider sympathetically whether there is anything that we can do in the circumstances that have been described.

Sir William Clark: My right hon. Friend spoke of the difficulties of defining the pre-1982 component and the roll-over relief, but the roll-over relief could be calculated. If it had been given on a profit, say, of £10,000, we know there would have been a deferment of £3,000 capital gains tax. I anticipate no administrative difficulty in assessing the amount. Nevertheless, I am delighted that my right hon. Friend will look again at this matter.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful for the sympathetic way in which my right hon. Friend has listened to my comments, and I am grateful also for the contributions made by my hon. Friends. A number of important points have been made, and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for the helpful way in which he has responded to them. I hope he will look carefully at the situation in which the actual rate of tax could be increased from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. As was said, that could create a most unfair anomaly for many taxpayers. However, in view of my right hon. Friend's remarks, I beg to ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Brooke: I should not want to leave the debate on this amendment with my hon. Friends under any misunderstanding about the terms in which I have responded. I have said that I will look sympathetically at the points made, but I am not responding to the questions of detail—particularly that relating to the 30 per cent. tax rate.

As to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South, it is in cases where the asset has been dismembered that complications arise in identifying the pre-1982 component.

Sir William Clark: Surely, if there has been a multiple acquisition of assets and the roll-over has gone on and on, the Inland Revenue has the record.

Mr. Brooke: The Inland Revenue, as my hon. Friend says, knows how much gain is being deferred. What the Revenue does not know—I am sorry if I did not manage to communicate this in my earlier remarks—is how much is attributable to the period before 1982.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Could the Minister put a cost or value on the amendment that we have been discussing?

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my earlier answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East.

Amendment negatived.

ASSETS HELD ON 31ST MARCH 1982

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Brooke: When the Government came into office in 1979, capital gains tax was unjust and damaging. Its most inequitable feature was that it taxed inflationary gains: it was in part a tax on maintaining the real value of the taxpayer's original capital. It was for that reason that we introduced indexation relief in 1982. In 1985, the indexation provisions were extended to give full relief for the effects of inflation after 1982. But at that time it was not possible to remove the charge on the inflationary gains of the 1960s and 1970s. The cost was too high.

My right hon. Friend's careful stewardship of the public finances has enabled him to tackle the problem in his Budget this year. That is what clause 91 does. Ideally, we would have extended indexation back to 1965, but when we looked into it, we found major difficulties. Quite often, the necessary records would no longer be available, particularly with shares, where there are provisions for pooling the cost of shareholdings built up in stages, and the precise cost and date of acquisition of a particular block of shares may well not have been retained. Moreover, extending indexation back in this way would have involved a very substantial compliance burden on taxpayers, who would often have had to undertake a good deal of work to put capital gains computations on the new basis; and it could have added significantly to the Inland Revenue's staff costs. Those practical problems ruled out the possibility of indexing the system back to 1965.

Instead, what clause 91 and schedule 7 do is bring forward the base date for computing capital gains from 1965 to 1982. This means that capital gains and losses will be confined to gains and losses arising since 1982, and of course only to real changes since then.

As in 1965, when capital gains tax was introduced, there are special rules to prevent taxpayers from being taxed on a larger gain, or given relief for a larger loss, than they have actually made. One example might be where a shareholding was bought for, say, £10,000 in 1975; was worth £2,000 in 1982; and is sold in 1988 for £15,000. Since 1982, the gain is £13,000, but overall only £5,000. The new rules will ensure that the taxable gain—subject to indexation—will be limited to the taxpayer's actual gain of £5,000. Another example is of shareholding bought for, say, £10,000 in 1975 which was worth £20,000 in 1982 and is sold in 1988 for £8,000. Here—again subject to indexation—the loss for tax purposes will be the taxpayer's actual loss of £2,000, not the £12,000 decrease in value since 1982.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am following with interest, as I did at the time of the Budget, and I can see how that is worked out in relation to shares that had a specific value in 1982. But how will a computation be made in relation to, say, a second home? How will the value of that home in 1982 be established? If it is done by taking its present value and working back on an indexation basis, does that not automatically cancel out any liability to capital gains tax? Surely there is a considerable difficulty here. What advice can the Minister give on how to overcome it?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman is quite right: it is a difficult issue. But it is an issue that already obliges us to make valuations from 1982 for the purposes of the existing legislation, and it is therefore something in which we have practice. I would be the last to deny that it is difficult, but nevertheless it is already under way.

In some cases there may be a gain under present rules and a loss since 1982, or vice versa; or there may be neither a gain nor a loss under the pre-Budget system. In those circumstances, the clause provides that from 6 April there will be neither a gain nor a loss for tax purposes. Again, there were equivalent rules in 1965 when capital gains tax was introduced.

These rules are fair, but they complicate the system, and they mean that many people will have to continue to keep records going back before 1982. As I have said, there were similar rules for 1965, when CGT was introduced. However, taxpayers were then able to make an election, covering their quoted shares and securities, that gains and losses would always be computed by reference to the 1965 market value, rather than under the special rules. Clearly, where an election was made, taxpayers were relieved of the need to keep pre-1965 records.

It has been suggested to us that, rather than be required to maintain pre-1982 records, some people would prefer to be able to make a similar election for 1982. This would of course mean that they would lose the protection of the special rules in the Bill. But it would in some cases relieve them of a significant compliance burden, and simplify their capital gains tax computations. And it would be wholly at the taxpayer's option.

We have decided that there is considerable merit in these suggestions. We propose to introduce measures under which taxpayers will be able to elect that, from 6 April 1988, their gains and losses on assets acquired before 1982 should be computed by reference to 1982 market values.

An election of this kind will be irrevocable. It will apply to all a taxpayer's assets, and to all his disposals after 6 April this year, including any that precede the election. In the case of groups of companies, it will have to be made —as was the case with the 1965 election—by the principal company, on behalf of the whole group.

If taxpayers' liabilities are not to remain open indefinitely, a time limit has to be set for making such an election. We propose that there should be two legs to this. First, all taxpayers will be able to make an election between now and April 1990, whether or not they make a disposal during that period of an asset acquired before 1982.

Mr. Boswell: May I intervene briefly with a simple query? We are aware that changes are being made in the taxation of husband and wife. Will some special provision be necessary in that case, or is the matter already covered in existing law?

Mr. Brooke: The simple answer is that the taxation relating to husband and wife does not come in until 1990. Nevertheless, I shall pay attention to my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Boswell: May I follow my question with another small point? What happens when an asset is jointly held? Is it likely to be possible, for example, for a husband to opt for a 1982 valuation, and for his spouse to opt for the alternative?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend is luring me on to marshy ground. I do not wish to be absolutely categorical about the contents of taxation that seeks to be independent, but I think that the answer is no.

That first leg of our proposal will enable those who decide that they do not want the burden of keeping pre-1982 records to get rid of them immediately.

Secondly, if an election has not previously been made when a taxpayer makes his first disposal—after 5 April 1988—of an asset held in 1982, he will still be able to make one within two years of the end of the accounting period or tax year in which he makes that first disposal.

With these provisions, those who would prefer to can have the protection of the special rules in the Bill, by simply deciding not to make an election. But those who are willing to dispense with that protection will be able to opt for a less complicated regime, in which they need no longer keep pre-1982 records. This seems to us a useful and sensible improvement to the provisions as drafted in the Bill, and we shall be tabling the necessary provisions at Report stage.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the changes he has just announced will be most welcome, especially to those who have smaller investments and for whom the rules in the Bill could have proved extremely complicated?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention.

I would like to make a few detailed technical points. Rebasing will use actual market values at 31 March 1982. Under the 1965 rules, for some assets, gains over a period straddling 1965 were time-apportioned in order to arrive at the gain since 1965—although the taxpayer always had the option of taking the actual 1965 market value. That was for practical reasons, to avoid forcing taxpayers to obtain a 1965 valuation of certain types of assets. There is no equivalent of the time-apportionment rules in this Bill. They are not needed, because, as I said to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), 31 March 1982 market values are already built into the system for the purposes of calculating indexation relief. To include a time-apportionment option now would be an additional—and unwelcome—complication.

Rebasing will apply to companies—as well as to individuals, personal representatives and trusts. In general it will apply only where taxpayers are disposing, on or after 6 April 1988, of assets which they themselves held on 31 March 1982. But paragraph 1 of schedule 7 contains an important exception. It extends rebasing to cases where the taxpayer acquired the asset by a no gain, no loss transfer from someone who did hold it in 1982. The main examples are where one spouse has given an asset to another, or an asset has been transferred within a group of companies.

The rest of schedule 7 is concerned with technical consequentials to rebasing. There is one provision, though, which it may be helpful to mention specifically now. At present, taxpayers who want indexation to be computed on the 1982 value have to say so. With rebasing, in most cases gains will be computed by reference to 1982 values—the exceptions arise under subsections (3) and (4) of the clause. It therefore makes more sense to provide, as we have done in paragraph 10 of the schedule, that indexation relief on assets acquired before 1982 will automatically be computed from the higher of actual cost or the value of the assets at 31 March 1982.

Clause 91 is part of a general reform of capital gains tax. We shall, of course, be debating the other clauses upstairs. But, very briefly, with the new top rate of income tax, and with inflationary gains taken out of tax, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was able to propose, in clauses 92 to 97, the assimilation of the rates of capital gains tax with those of income tax. At the same time, it is proposed in clause 101 that the annual exemption, which was specifically increased in 1982 because relief was not at that time given for pre-1982 inflation, should be reduced for 1988-89 to £5,000. Under clause 98, which the Committee debated yesterday, husbands and wives will, from 1990, be taxed independently on their gains.

Taken together, these reforms will achieve a much more equitable balance between the tax burden on capital gains and that on income. Rebasing will remove the long-standing injustice of taxing inflationary gains. It will unlock many assets acquired in the 1970s and earlier, freeing capital for new investment. The new election I have announced today will enable taxpayers, if they wish, to discard pre-1982 records. Assimilating capital gains tax and income tax rates will substantially reduce the incentive to have capital gains rather than income, with all the distortions that result. I commend these provisions to the Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: In his exciting speech, the Minister has clearly moved the Committee, mostly to other parts of the building, with his explanation of the problems faced by those who are unfortunate enough to have made a capital gain prior to 1982. The response from Opposition Members is that it is typical of the Government, in this Budget, yet again to be sorting out the problems of the wealthier members of society rather than the problems of the poorest. We have heard a lot about the problems of those who have made a capital gain prior to 1982. What about the problems of the generality of our population who have not come anywhere near doing any such thing? This Budget and the clause have absolutely nothing to say to them.

Every tax concession is potential public expenditure forgone. It is our view that a principal objective of public expenditure should be to redistribute wealth from those who have it to those who do not, rather than to redistribute further wealth to those who already have it.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to go a little further in my speech, I shall give way later. I want to move on to the detail of the changes as well as the generality.

[Mr. Brown]

The changes, in keeping with the main direction of the Budget proposals, do nothing to address the problems of the dispossessed or disadvantaged. The changes do nothing except give a further tax break to the wealthy. It is important to remember, as I reminded the Committee yesterday, that fewer than one in 100 of our fellow citizens pay capital gains tax. The clause, if accepted, means that still fewer people will pay capital gains tax, but they will still have their capital gain.

Mr. Butterfill: May I press the hon. Gentleman on his definition of the wealthy? Is he aware, in relation to property ownership, that quite a large number of people acquired property, originally for their own occupation, went abroad and while abroad let the property and it became subject to rent control and security of tenure was given to the tenant? Such people may have ended up with an unwanted investment property, originally purchased for their own occupation. Some of those people—I know of some in my constituency—are not wealthy people but are quite poor and have had to move into rented accommodation themselves. Those people, with mainly pre-1965 gains, will be specifically helped by this legislation. Does the hon. Gentleman at least approve of that element?

Mr. Brown: It is perfectly proper for Conservative Members to make the point about questions of degree and about types of capital gain. Those are perfectly proper areas for debate. However, the clause we are discussing goes much further than that, and I shall deal with the question of degree later.

At a total cost of £55 million to the Exchequer, capital gains tax on an individual's pre-1982 gains has been abolished. There is a similar cost of £235 million in respect of companies' gains. As I said before, that is public expenditure forgone. The key question that the Minister will have to answer when he responds to the debate is why the Government have chosen to spend public money in this way rather than in the many other ways in which it could have been spent. When the Minister responds to that point, as I am sure he will, the Committee will have to consider his remarks alongside yesterday's generosity to married couples who pay capital gains tax.

No doubt the defence will be that the gains, which were subject to taxation prior to rebasing were, at least in part, inflationary gains. The Chancellor referred to them in his Budget speech as purely paper profits. Yet that was compensated for in the taxation system by a flat rate tax of 30 per cent. and, alongside that, pretty generous individual annual exemptions.

It is also the case that inflation has a bearing on other tax as well as just capital gains tax. Therefore, the Government have to make the case for singling out capital gains tax for special sympathetic treatment. As I understand it, again by looking at what the Chancellor said in the Budget, the principal reason for that is that assets will be unlocked because they will no longer be subject to what he described as penal taxation and because the changes will help small business men and farmers in particular.

In proving that contention, the Government have two hurdles to clear. First, they have to demonstrate their case by example. They have to show that the operation of capital gains tax has become unreasonably burdensome without rebasing and that rebasing is not just a handout to rich companies and individuals—particularly to those who are asset-rich such as property companies and, one suspects, particularly London and south-east based companies. In saying that I come to the intervention made earlier by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill)—I accept that there are probably specific areas where such a case can be made out. I contend that such cases should be dealt with on that basis rather than to move from the particular to the general.

[Mr. Patrick Cormack in the Chair]

5 pm

Even if the Government could clear those two hurdles, they have another, higher hurdle to get over. They have then to make a case for complete tax exemption on capital gains to 1982, which is in the clause. It is one thing to argue reasonably that a tax is too high or there are special circumstances in the period covered, but it is quite another to say that the tax should be done away with altogether. The implication is that every capital gain made in the 1970s potentially subject to capital gains tax was solely the result of what the Chancellor exaggeratedly stated to be rampant inflation. Such an argument is not tenable, but there it is.

The Government rebasing wipes out any tax liability for gains on assets accruing before 1982. However, capital losses generated before April 1988 appear to be carried forward and offset against rebased gains to be generated in future, even if the losses were accrued before the new April 1982 base.

One suspects that there are likely to be a spate of disputes between valuers and claimants about valuations of unquoted shares and of property. That must create an extra work load for the Inland Revenue, which has public expenditure implications, without any gain to the Exchequer; quite the reverse.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman will know that I am a chartered surveyor by profession, so I have some knowledge of valuing property assets. My hon. Friend's suggestion will probably simplify the work of the Inland Revenue and those valuing such assets. Certainly, we had to look back sometimes as far as 1965 at the dusty old records that we were obliged to keep to justify valuation, so this change will be a great benefit to us in carrying out those valuations. The change will be of benefit to the valuation profession as a whole.

Mr. Brown: I enjoyed discussing matters of detail with the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West in the previous Parliament, when I had Opposition responsibility for legal affairs rather than finance. In Committee, the hon. Gentleman attended to matters of detail assiduously. His intervention today reflects that.

I accept that the Government's proposals might simplify the work of valuers, but the change as a whole is bound to incite a great influx of work. Indeed, I understand that it is intended precisely to do that. There will be implications in that case for public expenditure, which I should like to have heard the Minister address, but perhaps he will do so in the wind-up. This matter, of course, is peripheral to the main thrust of our objections, and not their cause. Our main fear is that rebasing, together with indexation and the generous annual exemptions, which the Minister said will be disaggregated for married couples from 1990, and a range of other reliefs and exemptions, will together thoroughly undermine the effectiveness of capital gains tax.

By undermining the tax, the Government act to the advantage of wealthier citizens—the less than one in 100, and perhaps many fewer, who have to pay the tax. It means that the burden of public expenditure falls on the rest of us. To the Labour party, that cannot be fair, and thus we shall be opposing the Government in the Lobby.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): First, I thank my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General for his response to our amendment. We understand that his response is conditional, but we are grateful for the terms in which he made it. I did not have the opportunity to reply appropriately when the amendment was introduced but I shall do so now, especially as I decided rather churlishly to bowl the Minister a couple of bouncers on the tax treatment of married couples.

Mr. Brooke: As my hon. Friend has referred to bouncers, it might be easiest for me to clarify my response. He will recall asking me whether husbands and wives would be able to make separate elections on jointly held assets. After a number of preliminary embroidering remarks, I said I thought not. I have to reverse that answer now, and say yes, because the election has to be made in respect of all an individual's assets. Each spouse can make a separate election that will apply to their respective interests in jointly owned property in the same way as to assets that are not jointly owned. The position was the same for 1965.

Mr. Boswell: I am most grateful to the Minister for that concession and clarification. I must also respond to the Minister's general points about the propriety of trying to strip inflationary gains—particularly, dare I say, those occurring in the 1970s, when there were certain inflationary habits in Government. That must be desirable, because those of us who held any sort of assets in the 1970s must have been apprehensive that contingent liabilities would mount up or become actual liabilities in some cases, when assets were sold or had to be disposed of. It should be no part of Government's role to attack capital through the contingent vehicle of inflation.

However, I welcome the Government's proper action to bring into line the system of taxation for capital gains along with that of income. I welcome that, equally, because it is no part of balanced and sensible government to have a regime where people can convert income into capital gains to take advantage of a beneficial tax regime. The spirit behind the Government's action must be acknowledged.

My remarks can be more detailed on certain aspects.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): If the hon. Gentleman believes what he has just said, would he go along with us and ask the Minister why there should be a £5,000 exemption from capital gains, which is much higher than the single or married person's allowance?

Mr. Boswell: I note the hon. Gentleman's point. My own view is that, bearing in mind that capital assets by definition tend to be held somewhat longer and that there are rules for trading in assets, as the hon. Gentleman knows, to bring people within the income tax system, it seems to be a reasonable balance and maintenance of relief. The point has been taken, but clearly one would not want to see a very wide divergence between the two regimes. Perhaps I should go further and say that when we settle down under the new system, the distribution effects must be monitored. I shall deal with those points again in a moment.

With regard to compulsory purchase orders, I must record the fact that they do not enable a vendor to control a sale, as he has no choice in the matter, nor always the timing of a sale, which might cause difficulties for some people. Equally, in cases of voluntary disposals of assets, bearing in mind that capital gains tax is now at a higher rate than the 40 per cent. income tax rate for some higher rate taxpayers, as the hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) implied, one might need to consider the de minimis provision, if not in this Bill then later, whereby a slightly larger proportion of an asset can be disposed of without attracting capital gains tax at the time.

Milk quotas were a new asset for farmland post-1982. It is odd that the milk quotas for many farms are now worth as much as the farms. Although the Government have responded by giving gains tax relief on milk quotas, the overall computation is not favourable. I should be grateful if the Government considered this matter.

Under the present system, capital gains have been brought broadly into line with income, but we are well aware that most people tend to hold on to capital assets significantly longer. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General referred to the great virtue in wiping out the need to keep records pre-1982. It is what I think the ancient Romans called novae tabulae, or new tables—it is a matter of wiping the slate clean and starting again. We all know what happens to papers, despite the best will in the world. The family dog may get to work on the paperwork, as happened to me, or one's children may move away——

Mr. A.J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The dog ate my homework—a likely story!

Mr. Boswell: I am certainly not saying anything unkind about dogs in this Committee. One may well find that records become less perfect and valuations less certain. I believe that the base year of 1982 will eventually need to be adjusted upwards, perhaps to 1992, which is another significant date for other reasons. I beg Ministers to think forward about whether there may be better ways of bringing the assessment of gains on continuing assets into the system in a way that is equitable in terms of income and calculable.

Stock dividends instance the problem well. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General knows that many companies, for various reasons—modernity may be one—offer shareholders the option of stock dividends. People may receive rather portentous pieces of paper, which we are told are important, announcing that they may be entitled to have another seven shares, which will be taxable but will be paid as a stock dividend. That may be fine, but, because of the complications of the capital gains tax computations, many small shareholders would be ill-advised to take that option. It would lead eventually to an expensive calculation on a very small asset. As Ministers know, transactions for small shareholders are now extremely expensive and are a major part of the disposition of any holding. The benefits become limited when the accountant's bill is added, since all these annual or semi-annual processes must be followed through.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my hon. Friend agree that it seems clear that it is Inland Revenue practice to suggest a figure for settlement of a negotiated capital gain and that this is unfavourable to the taxpayer? The Inland Revenue knows that the cost of going to the special commissioners is so high that it can strike a bargain down the middle on the cost.

Mr. Boswell: That certainly would happen.

We now have machinery that is intended to be fair as between income and capital gains, and that is entirely proper. Many ordinary asset holders hold capital assets much longer than income, but the circumstances are not always identical. We need to put on our thinking caps to find a better regime for the future so that people are fairly taxed on their assets, without undue or onerous complications.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): I understand that the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) is a farmer. It is good to see that he maintains the tradition of farmers in complaining about the injustices visited upon them. I have some sympathy with him if he has to put up with a motorway going through his farmland, but he is keeping up the good tradition of pointing out the difficulties that afflict his industry.

I should like to address the general philosophy behind the clause. We are entitled to ask why this measure is such a priority. At first sight, it is quite attractive to suggest that anomalies should be wiped out. It is particularly welcome that those people with small savings and those who rely on their savings in old age can now realise their assets when they need them. We suspect, however, that the priority and motivation behind the clause differ entirely from that. I hope that the Minister will specify precisely what problem has led to the need for this clause. We should have regard to the fact that there is a substantial cost in terms of tax forgone—£235 million for companies and £55 million for individuals.

5.15 pm

We have heard that there seems to be a difficulty in keeping records. The Treasury has seemed to go out of its way to save work for accountants. The justification for many measures seems to be that we do not have records, so we should not attempt to recover what might be due to the Exchequer. The principal reason advanced for the clause is that, between 1965 and 1982, there was rampant inflation, which has caused a manifest injustice. The Chancellor has said:

"But for gains that arose before 1982 the tax falls largely on purely paper profits resulting from the rampant inflation of the 1970s. In other words, it bites deeply, and capricously, into the capital itself."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 1007.]

The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he felt that the capital gains tax should fall only on real gains and not on paper gains.

It is interesting that 1982, not 1979, is taken as the base year. The Government constantly tell us that the good times started to roll in 1979. We remember that inflation reached record heights shortly after the Conservative party attained office and continued for some time. Within Conservative mythology, the years 1979 to 1982 have been written off, almost like the lost years in the Soviet Union —it does not exist; it never happened, we do not want to know about it. That is why 1982, rather than 1979, has been chosen. The Government are well aware that, by 1982, inflation was starting to subside but the markets were fairly depressed. The Government have chosen the optimum year.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): The year 1982 was chosen because that was the year in which indexation was introduced.

Mr. Darling: The justification for 1982 is perfectly apparent. Indexation could have been backdated to before 1982. It lies with the Government to arrange matters in any way they want. The year 1982, rather than 1979, was chosen for obvious reasons, which I have given.

There was inflation, but surely no one is saying that there were not real gains at the same time. Even if it is desirable—I accept that there is some merit in this—that a person should not be taxed for paper gains purely because of inflation, real gains would have been made between 1965 and 1982. That is our principal objection to the measure. A second home bought in 1966 for £16,000 might have been worth more than £100,000 in 1982, and no one says that that was due purely to inflation. It was a real gain and a real benefit which accrued to the taxpayer, and it is wrong that such gains should be written off in this way.

As we said in the debate on the business expansion scheme, those who benefit are generally the better-off, rather than those at the lower end of the income and capital scales. That is the fundamental reason why Opposition Members object to this scheme. It seems to be another example of the Government looking after the very people whom they have supported, not only in this Finance Bill but in previous financial measures. It is manifestly unjust and I cannot see why it should be made a priority at this time.

We are entitled to ask, with nearly £300 million in tax forgone, what else it could have been spent on. This Finance Bill is about the arrangements of the country's financial affairs for the next 12 months, at a time when there are unprecedented calls on housing benefit, the Health Service, and so on. Is it not the case that this money might well have been diverted to other fields instead of being given in what is, in effect, a tax handout to those who, although I do not say are not deserving, perhaps do not have the priority needs that others do?

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman states that we have given an unwarranted advantage to those who would have had pre-1982 real gains, as he puts it. Would he bear in mind the fact that we have at the same time increased the rate of tax from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. and reduced the threshold of the disregards, so that the overall effect may well be in some cases to increase the tax paid?

Mr. Darling: Some individual taxpayers may well lose, but the general thrust is to reduce the burden. The thresholds have been reduced and, as was said earlier, the position of a married couple in 1990 will be infinitely better. The emphasis is going the wrong way once again and I cannot see—I look forward to the Minister responding to this—the justification for writing off gains, inflationary and real, in those years. To my mind, that adds weight to our opposition to this clause. We have to remember that 31 per cent. of our population are living in poverty. If the Government showed the same concern for the anomalies that they face within the social security system I would not have so much objection. We are asking for equal treatment for those who have and those who have not.

There will have been inflationary gains and real gains in those years, but there were also inflationary wage rises, as the Government constantly tell us. So it is not true to say that somehow capital is alone in having suffered the ravages of inflation. The Government have shown themselves, in this clause, to be extending the double standards that they have practised for a long time now. It is for these reasons that we shall oppose this clause, because it is quite wrong and without justification.

Mr. Tim Smith: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) feels the way he does, because anybody who looks back over the 23-year history of capital gains tax—I think that it was Lord Callaghan, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, who introduced it in the 1965 Finance Bill—will see that although, of course, there is a flat rate, as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said, the rate of inflation must have been around 3 or 4 per cent.; it cannot have been more than that. So at that time, the kinds of inflationary gains that have subsequently taken place simply could not have been contemplated.

It will not do for Opposition Members to say that, because in their view the poor are being treated unjustly, that is some kind of justification for continuing to treat taxpayers unjustly, whoever they may be. Fairness is an important principle that should underlie taxation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Can the hon. Gentleman perhaps enlighten us as to how he justifies people not paying tax on real gains?

Mr. Smith: I have hardly embarked upon what I want to say, but I certainly was not planning to try to justify that. I believe that it is a matter of regret that the Treasury was unable so to arrange the new system that indexation was backdated to 1965. But we are talking about 23 years' history of certain assets, and we are told that this is simply not a practical proposition. I am sure that must be right.

The point that I want to make most forcefully to the Committee, because nobody has so far mentioned it, concerns what the rate of inflation was between 1965 and 1982. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central mentioned somebody who bought a house for £16,000 in 1965 and sold it for £100,000 in 1982. Since inflation over that period was 450 per cent., that would have taken the price up to £88,000, so the real gain would have been £12,000. The inflationary gain would have been £72,000. That is the size of the problem that the Government are addressing in this clause. People felt very strongly that this was desperately unfair, because there had been 450 per cent. inflation in the period and all of it was being taxed. In terms of fairness, that cannot be justified.

The consequence of that was that people did not sell their assets unless they absolutely had to. That is why I believe that the Treasury is right to say that now that we have a fairer system people, whether individuals or companies, will look at their asset portfolios, and we shall see assets unlocked. The Treasury has determined that the net result of this will be a loss of revenue of £55 million in the case of individuals and £230 million in the case of companies.

It must have made certain assumptions about people's behaviour. It is very difficult to know how people will behave in the face of tax changes, except that one can be quite sure that they will not behave in the same way as they were behaving before. We all know that there will be more activity in this field. People will start to dispose of their assets, so we can expect the number of taxable transactions to rise. I would not be at all surprised if, just as in the case of the cuts in income tax, this did not lead in the long run to an increase in the yield from capital gains tax.

It is this that highlights the division between the two main parties in the House. The Opposition are concerned all the time, when it comes to taxation policy, with redistributing wealth, whereas we are concerned with what system of taxation will maximise the yield and encourage the creation of wealth, which will lead in turn to the generation of more taxation to pay for more public expenditure. It was a matter of regret to me that the Treasury was not able to make this change earlier, but I understand that that simply was not possible against the economic background that prevailed at the time. So the Government have said that from 1982 onwards there will be some degree of indexation.

It will be recalled that it is not unprecedented for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to take action when taxpayers are being hard hit by inflation, because in 1975 the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing the crippling effect that inflation was having on companies, introduced overnight a huge stock relief and also increased capital allowances. These changes were introduced in 1975 because the cash flow of companies was so very badly affected.

I am glad that the same has now been done for people who, for one reason or another, have to pay capital gains tax. I also support the increase in the rate to 40 per cent. so that there will no longer be an incentive for taxpayers to convert income into capital, and vice versa. These changes make for a fairer and simpler tax system and I certainly support the inclusion of this clause in the Bill.

Mr. Wigley: I should like to follow on from the comments that have just been made. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred to people looking at their asset portfolios. I must admit that not very many of my constituents spend their time looking at their asset portfolios, and many of them would not have the faintest idea what they are. That concept applies to a very small proportion of the people, although I accept that it may be of importance to Conservative Members.

In my constituency, this sort of question is more relevant to small farmers and small business people, whose assets are probably in one item—their land or their building. The portfolio is one small item, in all probability, and is not changed around for the sake of getting tax benefits. It is something that has to work very hard in order to keep itself alive.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman, however, on the desirability of backdating indexation to 1965, if that were practicable. That would have kept the two concepts clear —ensuring fair play in relation to the considerable inflation that was taking place at certain times in the intervening period and the capital gains that took place —and we would not be considering whether important sums of money, such as £290 million, were being appropriately dealt with.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that small farmers would still have considerable problems in maintaining adequate records of, for example, improvements to their farms, which would need to be taken into account in computing any further liability to tax?

5.30 pm

Mr. Wigley: Yes, I am aware of that and of the need for change for that reason. Therefore, I am not completely hostile to the changes. I share the Opposition's doubts about the Government's priorities, and I should have liked more to be done for those groups who are not helped by the Budget, but I can see the argument for trying to do something to overcome some of the complexities and technical difficulties facing many people, including small farmers in my constituency. I am aware from the farmers, and in particular from the accountants trying to help them, of the problems that they face. None the less, £290 million is £290 million, and in a year when it has been impossible to find £150 million for the full implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, one starts asking questions about priorities.

There is clearly a need to ensure a balance between the treatment of capital and revenue income. That balance must ensure that people invest in capital or with a long-term view to revenue income as opposed to short-term capital gain. I understand that some Conservative Members may not share that view, but that should be the motivation of the tax system. It should try to ensure that that is the outcome of the rules.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) made a valid point a moment ago when he said that we should be asking what is the acceptable threshold for exemption—what should be the allowance in that context. If a single person's allowance is £3,000, what is the justification for £5,000 in the context of capital gains? Last night we discussed the most appropriate level for a husband and wife who now have an allowance of £10,000 between them. It might have been possible for them to have an allowance of £3,000 or £3,500 each, bringing us back to the kind of level that exists for a single person. That would have been consistent with what we are trying to do in capital gains tax. The opportunity to achieve greater consistency in order to get the balance right seems to have been missed, yet hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber seem to be looking for balance.

Milk quotas have been referred to, and they definitely affect Wales. Given their special treatment, one hesitates to think what will happen, perhaps in the early 1990s, if milk quotas come to an end. I know that the conventional wisdom is that that will not happen, but it could, and I can imagine there being quite a minefield in that area. However, I would be straying well out of order if I went too far down that road.

I want to return to a matter on which I pressed the Minister earlier. Although I listened to what he said, I am not sure whether I understood him sufficiently well to explain the matter to my constituents. If one of my constituents had bought some land for £20,000 in 1966, which he disposed of now for £150,000, there would be a capital gain of £130,000. If the value of indexation from 1982 to 1988 is 50 per cent., that would put the value of the assets in 1982 down to £100,000, making a gain of £80,000, which would tie in with the 450 per cent. change in the value of money over that period and a little more in real terms. However, I cannot see why, on the basis that indexation exists and there is a need now to make certain calculations for capital gains purposes, it gives us a valid valuation for this new datum base, which has to be established for 1982 for calculation purposes. I do not believe that that is the case.

The original value in 1966 and the present value, plus the index working back to 1982, is fine for present purposes, but on the changes that does not give us a real valuation for 1982. Whereas that can be easily worked out for shares, when it comes to land or buildings, which may, for a variety of reasons, have changed value, it is not so easy to work out a meaningful value in 1982. It may be possible to pluck a value out of the air and call it a notional value and do a split on a time basis, or something like that, but that is a far from satisfactory basis for establishing an important datum line for the future—the value in 1982.

I should be grateful if the Minister would clarify in more detail exactly how the existing provisions for the calculation of capital gains tax liability give a figure which is meaningful in the context of the use to which it will be put under clause 91. Unless that can be satisfactorily clarified, we are in danger of building an edifice on a base in 1982 which, in many instances, may be far from solid. Such a change will be with us for years to come. That point needs to be clarified. The definition needs to be equally applicable in all capital gains cases. We should not have a system which works well only for stocks and shares and creates a minefield in other areas. More than that I do not wish to say at this stage, but I should be grateful for the Minister's detailed response to those points.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Opposition Members have expressed their general dislike of the clauses relating to capital gains tax, but there is one point that they should not overlook and that is that for those who make large gains the effective rate of capital gains tax will have gone up by 10 per cent. as a result of the Bill. The capital gains tax rate for those who make smaller gains or who have smaller incomes will go down by 5 per cent. That effect of the Bill should not be ignored.

Dr. Marek: Can the hon. Gentleman justify the fact that the Chancellor, when he made his Budget statement on 15 March, gave people who pay capital gains tax until 6 April to arrange their affairs to their best advantage?

Mr. Arbuthnot: Yes. I have felt for a long time that the tax changes in Britain are introduced far too suddenly in order to prevent a few days of evasion or avoidance here or there. If we could have a bit of warning so that our tax legislation was sensible, rather than for the short-term bringing in of some revenue to the Treasury, we would end up with a much more sensible set of tax laws.

I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said in relation to the election for clause 91. I hesitate to say this, and I hope that I may be forgiven for doing so, but I raised on Second Reading the complications introduced by clause 91 and I am delighted that my right hon. Friend has been so responsive so quickly. It has been a habit of mine so far to be rather critical of our complicated legislation, particularly in relation to tax, and I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend for responding, not necessarily to me, but to all the representations that have been made.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): The only sympathetic chord in me that the Government have struck this afternoon has been on the prospect of people destroying records before 1982. Even with my monthly household bills, it is difficult to keep records for more than a few months. Therefore, the idea of destroying records before 1982 is rather attractive. Apart from that, the rebasing put forward by the Government is not justified —or, at least we have not been given sufficient information to decide whether it is justified or not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) pointed out that fewer than one in 100 taxpayers pay capital gains tax. I wonder whether the Government estimate that the figure will be further reduced this year because of the rebasing decision. We have also heard about the cost to the Exchequer which rebasing will involve. Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends feel that the Government have been generous enough already to big business and to wealthy individuals and that this is just an additional way of being even more generous to them.

The people who are likely to benefit from rebasing will probably live in one corner of the United Kingdom, the south-east of England. This is yet another example of adverse regional trends. The answer to a parliamentary question tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) made it clear that higher rate taxpayers are concentrated largely in the south-east of England. Rebasing will channel even more money into that area. If the Government have any figures, I should like to see them. When analysing the Bill and its probable effects it is difficult to know precisely what the regional implications are because the Treasury seldom gives us the figures on a regional basis. Therefore, we do not have official sources for the figures which many of us suspect would be revealing.

Several hon. Members have referred to the extent to which profits made prior to 1982 were real profits or simply the result of inflation. I am in no doubt that many substantial real gains were made. An article in The Guardian on 17 March dealt with the reaction of the stock market to the changes in capital gains tax. It said:

> "For example, shares in the electronics group Racal rose more than 7,000 per cent. between 1965 and 1982 when it was one of the market's star performers . . . A large number of private and professional investors have now been relieved of capital gains tax liability on that enormous profit up to 1982".

I do not know how closely the Government have looked at the short-term and long-term effects on the stock market of the rebasing decision. Certainly many people decided to sell their shares because of it and some shares fell as a result.

The same article pointed out:

> "Brewery, property, life assurance and investment trust shares all benefited from the removal of pre-1982 tax liabilities".

Selling was held back because of the previous policy on capital gains, but now big financial combines have been relieved of their huge capital gains tax liabilities.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does the hon. Lady appreciate that every company quoted on the stock exchange has benefited from the change, for the very good reason that between 1965 and 1982 inflation was 450 per cent.? Does not she think that one principle underlying taxation policy should be fairness?

Ms. Quin: I accept that a principle underlying taxation policy should be fairness, but I do not think that anyone could claim that the Budget was an example of fairness. The example I quoted made it plain that, whatever the level of inflation, there were considerable real gains made in addition.

I should like to hear the Government's view on how rebasing may affect the migration of individuals and trusts. When they transfer their residence, they will not have to pay capital gains tax on their way out of the United Kingdom. Has a calculation been done of the possible cost of the rebasing decision?

5.45 pm

Several Conservative Members have referred to the accompanying measures on capital gains tax and to the fact that income tax rates and corporation tax have been brought into line. Have the Government considered the consequences for small businesses of the decision to have 40 per cent. and 25 per cent. rates? I understand that those associated with the British Venture Capital Association are concerned that it may mean a reduction in the amount of venture capital.

While I am not arguing against the change to 40 per cent. for capital gains tax, I believe that the Government should consider measures to make sure that small businesses, particularly in areas where they are most needed, can still expand and have access to venture capital. In this respect the Government might like to consider the proposal of the Labour party for a national investment bank with a large amount of money involved in venture capital.

I do not think that the Bill will do anything to end tax avoidance. Are the Government planning to offset the gains which will be made from the measure by a more efficient clampdown on tax avoidance?

I agree with my right hon. and hon. Friends that the Government have got their priorities wrong. The people about whom I am most worried are those with dwindling capital, such as pensioners who find that, because of the cuts in benefits and the changes in social security, they are for ever having to dip into the small nest eggs which they had saved over many years. It is distressing that people are worried about the payment of funeral bills when their small stock of capital has depreciated because they have had to dip into it so many times as a result of recent Government financial decisions. We are concerned about helping such people, and we do not believe that the Government have got their priorities right in the Finance Bill.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak on a matter such as capital gains tax rebasing, because we simple roadsweepers, swineherds and such like on this side of the Committee have the opportunity to be educated by the professionals on the Conservative Benches from accountancy, merchant banking and chartered surveying. We are getting a free education. We should really pay to be Members of Parliament for the duration of the Finance Bill Committee stage.

I want to point out to the Minister and his cohorts on the Benches behind him that we are not yet satisfied about capital gains tax rebasing. Some Conservative Members say that rebasing has been done because of the concept of fairness, while others say that it has been done because of economic performance. It is the supply side myth or the supply side causal relationship, as they would see it. The idea is that the performance of the economy will be improved by the rebasing because assets will be more fluid and flexible and people will be more willing to invest and take risks.

That is not necessarily the same thing as the idea that inflationary gains, which are not real gains, should not be taxable because they are not real. Taken in isolation and without regard for any one year's Budget, we would agree with that point. But how to tax inflationary gains, or how to avoid taxing them, and how to leave the tax system taxing effort and risk on a fair basis is extremely complicated, and rebasing to 1982 does not solve the problem.

I could give several examples. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) was present when we discussed the impact of the poll tax on the valuation of assets for the purposes of local government finance. That is relevant, because RPI inflation and asset inflation are entirely different; in fact, they can work in reverse. If retail prices index inflation increases, asset inflation—or deflation—can go in the opposite direction. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West intervened in my speech when I made the point that asset price inflation has been high in areas such as Cardiff in the past two years. The valuation of office blocks and shops has doubled in the past two years. While retail price inflation may have been 7 or 8 per cent., asset price inflation has been 200 per cent.

How does one compensate for this asset price inflation, which is working at almost South American levels? Two weeks ago, on Third Reading of the Local Government Finance Bill, the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West took the view that, as there had been no rating revaluation in provincial cities such as Cardiff since the late 1960s, businesses there were paying artificially low rates, which led to artificially high rates of valuation. If I follow the argument, rent and rates are a combined charge on the user, so valuation is a residual element after people have paid rates and rents, and there can be hyperinflation of assets—of house prices in the south-east, of office block prices in provincial cities such as Cardiff.

It is, then, an extremely complicated matter to try to strip out RPI artificial gains. How are we to handle the genuine gains of Uruguayan proportions, which have infected western economies, at the asset level, but not at the RPI level?

Mr. Boswell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that typical families who own one house and experience this high level of asset gains—which he fairly reports—usually want to transfer to another house? At the moment they can avail themselves of the capital gains tax exemption.

Mr. Morgan: None of us wants to introduce capital gains tax on the principal residence. I merely make the point that asset price inflation has risen to hyperinflationary levels during the past two years, whereas RPI inflation has been at levels that we would consider low since the OPEC price rises of 1972-73. Asset price inflation in house prices in the south-east and many other parts of the country of the past two, five or seven years has caused great difficulties for new buyers. However, that is not a matter for today.

Today we are interested in what has caused the hyperinflation of assets in this country in the past two years—for example, high street shops in provincial centres with good trading records and office blocks in centres such as Cardiff. How are those inflationary gains to be stripped out? Are they inflationary or real? How can they be compared with the so-called inflationary gains that the Government want us to forget and wipe away—the gains from 1965 to 1982, and above all those following the OPEC rises of July 1973, when hyperinflation took hold of the RPI?

Mr. Butterfill: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman about property values. The reason that there has been an unusually high increase in the value of shops in many places is that there has been an increase in rental values, largely due to increases in turnover and profitability for shop operators. Those rental values have been compounded by a drop in the level of return required by institutional investors. That has meant that the multiple that people are prepared to pay of the rent demanded for shops has increased. Those two factors combined have led to the increases the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there has been a relative shift between one asset and another, with one becoming more popular than the other? That is the reason for so-called real gains. I am not sure whether he thinks that that should necessarily be taxable per se.

Mr. Morgan: I shall have to reduce the offer I made to pay Conservative Members for the quality of technical education that we are getting this afternoon. The hon. Gentleman has now removed one of the key elements that he mentioned in his intervention on Third Reading of the Local Government Finance Bill. I believe that the Secretary of State for the Environment agreed with the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West when he said that one of the reasons for hyperinflation in asset value in the last four years in typical high street locations in the south of England and in prosperous provincial shopping centres such as those in Cardiff and Newcastle was the long-delayed rating revaluation—since 1969 or, in some cases, 1973.

Mr. Butterfill: I said that that was an underlying cause of part of the rent increase, not all. Rates have been held down, but I have just said that, in the context of capital values, one must take into account not only the rent increase but the reduction in yield required to produce enhanced capital value.

Mr. Morgan: I take it that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me that he said two weeks ago that rent rises were partly caused by the delayed rating revaluation, and also be reducing yields. If part of the reason for the hyperinflation of asset values in commercial property in the past two years has been a delay in the Government's district valuers' service carrying out the revaluation—we all agree that it should be carried out more frequently than every 19 years—it becomes extremely complex to try to strip out RPI inflationary gains—unreal gains—which should not be taxed, and real gains, which should be taxed and from which every honest taxpayer should be willing to contribute.

If the delay in revaluation was at least a partial cause of artificially high rent returns, and therefore of the valuation put on commercial property, it is extremely difficult to work out why we are trying to correct, through the rebasing provisions, one form of unfair taxation on purely monetary gains, but are not trying to compensate for the other problems because they were apparently caused by Governments of both parties grossly delaying commercial revaluation, which delay has contributed to hyperinflation in important commercial properties in the past two years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) mentioned Racal as the classic example of the company that did well when the rest of the country did badly. During the OPEC decade, when huge quantities of disposable income were shifted out of this country into OPEC countries—between July 1973 and early 1986, when oil prices fell from $35 a barrel to $8 a barrel—massive gains could be made by selling, for instance, tactical radios to armies in the Gulf states. Companies in that line did extremely well during that brief period and made 7,000 per cent. gains. As I think the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said, they have stood still during the past two and a half years, as all the income that went to the Arab countries suddenly sloshed back into western countries when the price of oil dropped to roughly half what it was in early 1986.

One then tries to work out what is the inflationary gain that we all assume was general throughout the economy for companies that were having to cope, like all western economies, with the problems caused when all that disposable income was being shifted from western consumers to the OPEC countries. Some companies did extremely well out of that because they managed to spot the opportunities for selling goods to the states which suddenly had all that disposable income.

How does one equate the proper way of compensating for inflationary gains for companies such as Racal, which was the supreme example of the gainers from the OPEC price rise, with that for the companies at large, such as those in heavy industry, which manufactured capital goods for our use, when investment was falling through the floor and they had to suffer a wait of 10 or 12 years without an order for a power station or a steel works? This is an extremely complicated issue.

[MR. TED LEADBITTER in the Chair]

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield mentioned my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and the introduction of stock appreciation relief in 1975. I think that we would all agree that that relief was given at an extremely generous level. Its function was, in part, that of stock appreciation relief and in part, to do the job about which we are now talking. We could probably agree that it was at least in part intended to cover capital gains that would be taxable but that ought not to be taxable but, as it was too complicated to rebase capital gains so that inflationary gains would not be taxable, stock appreciation relief meant that corporation tax dropped to virtually zero receipts in the closing years.

That was partly because profitability was extremely low as consumer disposable income was suddenly washed out of western countries and into the OPEC countries and it was difficult for people to make profits in the western countries in the period from 1974 to 1977. Stock appreciation relief went somewhat over the top partly in order to compensate the company not only for the cost of replacing stocks at inflationary prices but for the capital gains which they were not making, but which they appeared to be making on paper with rampant inflation in the period from 1974 to 1981.

Mr. Tim Smith: I do not think that stock relief went over the top. Each year it compensated the company, as a deduction from its corporation tax liability, for the extra replacement costs of carrying the same trading stock. That change was forced on the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time. If he had not made it, many companies would have gone to the wall. However, at the same time, people were forced to pay capital gains tax on similar inflationary gains, and that was wrong.

Mr. Morgan: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is completely disagreeing with me or is coming 50 per cent. towards what I said. I do not say that the prime purpose was not stock appreciation relief, because it was. No honest member of the staff of the Inland Revenue would have been willing to engage in administering the scheme if he had thought that its purpose was entirely different from that set out in the rubric. I think that hon. Members on both sides would agree that stock appreciation relief was pitched generously and administered generously to ensure that companies did not go out of business because of inflation, and the Inland Revenue was not too fussy about seeing whether what it was administering was strictly stock appreciation relief or a combination of the extraordinary tax liabilities that could arise not only out of stock appreciation but on capital gains which were not real, but which could place an extraordinary capital strain on companies. As a result, the tax take on corporation tax disappeared virtually to zero in the closing years of the period from 1976 to 1981. It brought in virtually no revenue because stock appreciation relief was generous and was doing part of its job.

In stripping out the 1965 to 1982 capital gains and, in particular, in stripping out the hyperinflation of the period from 1974 to 1981, we must have regard to the fact that we might be compensating people twice—once for what has already been done by the over-the-top element in the stock appreciation relief, which meant that companies simply did not pay corporation tax, and, secondly, in the formal structure of the rebasing provisions that we are discussing today.

Are we talking about fairness—in other words, a major effort to strip out statistically exactly what were the inflationary gain and not to tax those—something with which we would all agree—or are we talking about somehow or other restructuring the capital gains tax system so that it encourages the economy to perform better so that assets can be freely traded at a fair level and people do not get bogged down in paperwork when they are trying to run businesses and so on? Again, we would agree with that aim. However, we would not be happy with the explanations that we have heard so far, as they have jumped about from fairness to performance and from performance back to fairness. We need to know the real purpose behind this rebasing provision.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I hope that the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) will forgive me if I do not follow his line of argument. However, he made one point to which I would respond as a Back Bencher on the Government side. What the Government are doing is a rough and ready way of solving the dreadful problem of inflation that plagued this country from 1965 to 1982. Some of the matters to which the hon. Gentleman drew the attention of the Committee are valid and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will be responding to them positively and constructively.

Dr. Marek: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could give us a rationale about the comparison between housing benefit and the changes in social security? The Prime Minister said that when one has reorganisation, there are gainers and losers, but in this reorganisation of capital gains tax and rebasing to 1982, there are no losers—they are all gainers.

Mr. Tim Smith: There are losers.

Dr. Marek: No, there are only gainers.

Mr. Winterton: There are occasions when it is better not to give way, and this may have been one. I made strong representations to the Government on the matter of housing benefit and social security reform because I felt that they pitched the capital limit and started the taper too low. As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services promised amendments which will be introduced by regulations. That has eased the situation, although I wish that he had gone further than he has. In these social security reforms there have been gainers and losers. I agree that, under the capital gains proposals in clause 91 and schedule 7, everybody gains.

Mr. Tim Smith: No.

Mr. Winterton: Yes. Everybody gains in some way, and some more than others. That is my understanding of the situation. I shall address my remarks to one particular sector, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will consider my argument and see whether it is possible for the Government to introduce some amendment at a later stage of the Bill, perhaps on Report, to meet the problems that face minority shareholders in a small private unquoted company. There is no doubt that this group of people lose out under these proposals. It is an extremely complicated matter, and generally small businesses and private companies welcome what the Government are doing. It is good news for all old established private companies which may seek a quotation on the London stock exchange at some time.

However, the capital gains provisions produce a surprising effect. If the shares of a private company are owned by a single shareholder, these capital gains are entirely free from capital gains tax. On the other hand, in a family business, where the shares have been shared out among members of the family perhaps to give—again very much in accordance with Conservative philosophy—succeeding generations a continuing interest in the development of the business, then if, for example, there were five equal shareholders, those indexed capital gains to March 1982 will effectively be taxed not at zero rate, as for a single shareholder, but at about 30 per cent. That was confirmed to me by a tax barrister who examined the legislation.

The Revenue considers that such shareholders are minority shareholders without influence, and therefore the deemed cost of their shares is reduced by about 75 per cent. That has the unfortunate effect that the retiring owners of family companies, if the Bill goes through unamended, will be strongly discouraged from transferring their shares to their children, or indeed to others who may be working in the business.

There have been letters on the subject in the Financial Times, and I believe in other papers. A letter from a City firm of chartered accountants refers to a letter

"contrasting the taxation consequences of a complete sale of a company by a single shareholder with that of a sale by five family shareholders," which, its experts say,

"highlights an important anomaly made worse by the 1988 Budget proposals."

The letter goes on to provide an even more curious explanation of what is going to happen. It says:

"In fact the anomaly is even more curious. If the business had either been carried on by a partnership or by a company owned by a partnership, even with five proprietors the 31st March 1982 valuation would have been on a controlling interest basis. This follows the Inland Revenue's Statement of Practice 1/75 which includes the following paragraph."

I hope that the House will excuse me if I read it out, as I think it is important:

"'Where it is necessary to ascertain the market value of a partner's share in a partnership asset for capital gains tax purposes, it will be taken as a fraction of the value of the total partnership interest in the asset without any discount for the size of his share. If, for example, a partnership owned all the issued shares in a company, the value of the interest in that holding of a partner with a one-tenth share would be one-tenth of the value of the partnership's 100% holding.'"

The letter finishes with a plea:

"The relevant provisions in this year's Finance Bill are to be debated" today.

"It is to be hoped that an appropriate amendment will be tabled."

I could have tabled an amendment, but the matter is extremely complicated, and I believe that the Treasury needs to consider it very carefully. The anomaly existed before, but it is made worse by the changes in the Bill. I have had the privilege of discussing the matter with the Financial Secretary, in my view, all too briefly. In addition, it is my intention to submit to the Treasury my views and evidence in writing, suggesting amendments and asking for its views on those amendments, so that at a later stage of the Bill, hopefully, the Government will understand the problem and the particular difficulties that the proposals will cause to minority shareholders in private unquoted companies. I am confident that my right hon. Friend and his ministerial colleagues did not intend that to happen when they proposed these fairly radical changes in the Budget.

I end my remarks—I hope that they have been constructive—by saying that I am seeking the understanding of the Committee and, more difficult, of the Treasury. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take my remarks to heart and discuss them with the Treasury, and hopefully, at a later stage in the Bill, table amendments to remove, or at least to reduce, the anomalies, which I believe are unfair and should be rectified.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): You may recall, Mr. Leadbitter, that I made my first contribution upstairs in Committee when you were in the Chair. It is a privilege for me to make my first contribution in Committee of the whole House under your chairmanship.

Conservative Members will recall that before this Government came to power political parties in this country accepted the need for a degree of progressivity in tax on income and capital.

Mr. Boswell: Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Henderson: Perhaps later. I have hardly begun my speech.

It is most disturbing that clause 91 is a further step towards denting any belief in progressivity. Clearly, as Conservative Members have already acknowledged during the debate, it helps the richer sections of the community.

6.15 pm

Hon. Members will recall that capital gains tax was initially introduced because of the very obvious weaknesses in estate duties. We have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) about the debate on stock appreciation during the 1970s. The Committee will recall that that debate was about capital that was held by individual citizens. I recognise that the changes which took place in 1982 on indexation are welcome. We cannot criticise those changes six years later. They were necessary on the grounds of efficiency, so that the real value of a particular asset was assessed when it was transferred from one individual to another.

I can say to Opposition Members that, whether the issue is social justice in relation to capital gains or whether it is revenue, the Government of the day can alter the rate of tax which applies at a particular level. I accept completely that there should be indexation.

I was interested to hear the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith). I hope that he will not be offended, but even he—renowned as a fairly strong supporter of the Government—understands that if there is no form of indexation prior to 1982, it will be a free ride for the holders of capital during that period.

I do not think that that can be justified on any grounds. It certainly cannot be justified on the ground of social justice or of tax revenues, and we are always hearing from Conservative Members about the need to maximise revenues. I hope that Conservative Members will accept that it cannot be justified on grounds of efficiency, because the real value of the transfer of a particular asset would not be taken into account. We are talking about efficiency in the economy and the need for some people to dispense with assets that they do not need at a particular time or, when they decide to get rid of them and transfer them to others who need them for productive reasons, that that should be done through a fair system.

Mr. Boswell: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I did not wish to interrupt him earlier in his speech. I wish to raise two points. First, does he accept that, under the new basis for capital gains tax, for the first time there is a progressive system in relation to long-term gains at 25 per cent. and 40 per cent? Secondly, bearing in mind that some of the assets purchased on or before 1965 may not be realised for 50 years, is he confident that even the Inland Revenue could conduct a realistic valuation of the 1965 basis of private companies in the year 2015?

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising those two points. I shall return to his second point later. I was going to mention it in any case.

On the first point, I agree that it is desirable that there should be some progressivity in the rate of tax that is charged. On the face of it, this is so, compared to the previous system.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) will remember that under a Labour Government capital gains tax was higher for everybody. Capital gains tax is being restored for certain sections of the community, but the hon. Member for Daventry, who has a good working knowledge of how taxation affects the farming community, will be aware that when, under the new system, the marginal rate of tax applies to capital gains, it will be easy for a male farmer with a higher income to transfer an asset to his spouse with a lower income from another source. She will then be able to claim capital gains tax at 25 per cent. In that sense, it is not progressive. The Committee upstairs will consider in more detail the principle of separate taxation. I accept that principle, but anomalies have been created that have undercut the arguments in favour of capital gains tax progressivity.

Rebasing cannot be looked at in isolation. We have to consider the background to rebasing. The fact that only one out of 100 taxpayers will be affected is a telling point that cannot be ignored. We have to consider also the changes that were made in 1986. Lifetime gifts are no longer liable to capital transfer tax. Many asset holders have been let off the tax hook. Having already been let off the tax hook, they are now being given a free ride on the assets that they held before 1982. A tax lawyer has told me that the capital assets of families are now on a permanent tax-free merry-go-round and that some assets will have more owners than there were owners of the Rowntree share certificates during the last few weeks. That is true. Transfers will be made from one member of a family to another at the lower rate of tax, whenever that is possible.

Other background factors have to be taken into account when considering the corporate sector, whose tax liability has already been reduced, due to the reduction in the rate of corporation tax. That, too, will be let off the hook on its asset values before 1982.

The Government claim that they are tax reformers, but the impact of many of the Government's changes, including clause 91, is to dismantle taxation measures in such a way as to benefit the rich. The rich have gained dramatically. My hon. Friend the member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) said that the effect of the proposed changes is that £55 million will be given to individuals in 1989-90 and that £235 million will be given to companies. The speculators of the 1970s who were out to make a fast buck by buying property are now being let off the hook by the Government, who say that they will protect them from losses that were made before 1982, by allowing their losses to be set against gains that were made after 1982. I suggest that that is to have one's Nigel cake and eat it.

The Minister said that the records that would enable another course of action to be taken do not exist. That argument is unacceptable. It bears little relationship to the way in which business is conducted. We are dealing largely with property and shares. Records of the purchase price of property are always kept. Records are also kept, at both ends, of transactions in stocks and shares. They are kept by the current holders of the shares and by the institutions that sell stocks and shares. If the argument were reversed and if it were said that anybody who held an asset before 1982 would be given an additional bonus in the 1988 Budget, provided that they could say what was the original price of the asset, I am sure that the records would soon be found. Even small farmers would quickly find the records that would enable them to qualify for their bonus. The argument that records have not been kept is unacceptable.

I have received a letter from a gentleman who is living on £73·53 a week invalidity benefit. He has lost £8·19 a week because of the housing benefit changes. Why is there to be this free ride for the rich on the value of their assets before 1982 while this poor fellow, who fought for his country and who is now suffering for it, has lost over 10 per cent. of his real income? If he is told that he has to suffer because the economy has become more efficient and that we shall all gain from it in the longer term, he might understand the argument, even though he might not agree with it. But if he is told that all this money has been given away to the rich because property records or records of stocks and shares cannot be found, he will say that he does not believe it. I should be tempted to agree with him. We are responsible for monitoring the changes to the fiscal law. We must challenge the Government when we believe that the legislation they have introduced is unfair.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is not always the record of the purchase price that is in question? It may be the value of the property at 5 April 1965 that is in question. If an asset were acquired before that date, one would have to provide a theoretical valuation of what that asset was worth at that time. It may be difficult to establish that value, if the asset is property. Properties around it may have been bought. If the property is in a clearance area, the surrounding properties may have been knocked down. The asset may have changed materially since 1965.

It may also be difficult to prove what the condition of the property was at that time—for example, whether it had central heating, or whether central heating was installed subsequently. It is difficult to make a theoretical valuation for property. It is even more complicated if the property is not owner-occupied. It may contain several tenants, in which case it may be necessary to look at the nature of the leases at that time and at what might have happened to those leases. It would also be necessary to consider by how much the rent and investment yields may have increased in relation to income. Those are all theoretical points, and my profession would have to make a guess about those assets in 1965. It is by no means as simple a problem as the hon. Gentleman makes out.

Mr. Henderson: I do not wish to be flippant, but I recall a professor of economics telling me that one could be Chancellor of the Exchequer with first-year university applied economics. I do not know whether that is true, but, with something less than first-year university applied economics, one could work out an approximate evaluation of assets held in 1965. It is a question of the retail prices index compared with other indices, and the hon. Gentleman knows that to be the case.

6.30 pm

The Minister must put forward convincing reasons why that effective handout to the rich should be made. Will he argue that the additional relief will aid business? That will be difficult to argue because, as I understand it, most assets that are clearly seen to be productive towards business are largely exempt from capital gains tax in any case. I cannot therefore see any argument that the Minister can make out for that case, although I shall listen with interest to his reponse.

It is sometimes argued that we have to hand out money because we must make more available for investment in industry in this country. Again, it will be interesting to see whether the Minister deploys that argument, but, if there is an argument for investment, it does not matter whether it is in the public or private sector. It does not matter whether the Government build a new railway line between London and Dover or whether it is done by the private sector. In either case, it will probably cost a similar amount. Such arguments will not cut much ice with my disabled constituent who has already raised with me the question of the lack of social justice.

It is also argued that it is not worth while having an assessment before 1982 because it would cost more to assess the asset than the amount that would be raised. That argument cannot be made out, because the cost will not vary very much, whichever dates are used. My constituent will not be particularly charmed if the Minister comes forward with that argument.

The Conservative party has often said, particularly before it came to power in 1979, that it was necessary to do some things in the national interest that might be unpalatable, but, even on this occasion, it cannot clam that it is in the national interest. The Minister should admit that this is part of the handout to the Government's rich backers and supporters and that the benefit to the rest of the community is nil.

I hope that those Conservative Members who have noted the philosophical arguments that have been put forward, and other Conservative Members, such as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, who have recognised the technical arguments, will join us in opposing clause 91.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I shall be brief, as I have already spoken twice on the Bill. I want to address the point made quite reasonably by a number of Conservative Members about the difficulties of valuing assets for the purpose of estimating their value up to 23 years ago.

The Inland Revenue has much experience of those matters. As I understand it, it is now doing precisely that. That is how it assesses capital gains tax liability. In all my years in this place, I have never had any complaints from constituents about unreasonable treatment in the valuation of their assets. I assume that the Inland Revenue would have been involved in estimating the value of assets held between 1965 and 1982. Perhaps the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) will intervene if I am wrong. If he accepts that the Inland Revenue has such experience, surely that destroys any argument that may be used about the principle of valuation.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman tempts me to intervene. I have certainly received many complaints about that matter and perhaps I can give him an anecdote from my experience. Only six months ago I managed to agree with the Inland Revenue the final computations in respect of a sale of shares in a company that I was running and that I sold at the end of 1976. It has taken almost 12 years to agree the valuation. That is due to the complexities that can arise in respect of private companies and properties. A whole division of the Inland Revenue deals with those matters day after day. Those people have a high level of expertise, but the complexity of the transactions is enormous and the cost to the taxpayer great.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Inland Revenue may have a whole division involved in valuing such things, but I am sure that it has the necessary expertise. In eight years, no constituent has ever brought such a case to me, and I am sure that is true of many of my hon. Friends. Accountants in my constituency are keen to come to me if they want my support in making representations, and I willingly provide it wherever possible. I am sure that they would have come to me if the problem had existed.

Those matters are exaggerated because they serve the purpose of the argument. The Government may introduce the measure not only to help a small minority of people, but because they are obsessed with reducing the number of civil servants. They may believe that they can make economies in Civil Service numbers in this area when another Government of a different political persuasion might be less keen to make so-called economies.

I wish to simplify the matter for the general public who may have difficulty in following our debates. If they listen to what is being said in Committee today, they may not understand what we are talking about. I want to make it clear what we are talking about.

If, between 1965 and 1970, a person bought a painting for £100,000 and decided to sell it this year for £10 million —the last £5 million of that having accrued between 1982 and 1988—the first £5 million, which represents the increase in value between 1965 and 1982, would not be subject to tax.

Mr. Boswell: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House how much tax has already accrued to the Exchequer under the previous regime on that notional gain which is now hypothetically released? Will he also tell us how much capital gains tax would accrue to the Exchequer under the present regime, if the person were to die possessed of that asset?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I can only say what the Minister would say to the hon. Gentleman, although I do not have an hon. Friend to whom I can turn for a reply. If he gives me written notice of the question, I assure him that I will give him an answer when I have secured it from the Minister.

I should like to make it clear to those who are listening to our debate today that many people, although they may be few as a proportion of the population, will make millions of pounds out of the concession. They will simply not be liable to tax. That is what we object to.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) spoke most ably about the problems that arose with stock relief in the late 1970s. It should be admitted that stock and appreciation relief related not only to a fixed volume of stock. In practice, people claimed relief on an increasing volume of stock over a period of years. Many people thought that an abuse of the scheme, but it was extremely difficult for the Inland Revenue to keep a check on it. One hon. Gentleman is an accountant, and I think that I once heard him talking about this matter at a meeting outside this Chamber. He might care to confirm that I am right. It could be argued that that was a windfall for much of British industry as it was able to avoid tax within the law.

Such a process led to an increased value being put on companies. If that increase were realised before 1982, it could be said to be an increase which bore no relation to increases as a result of inflation. Surely such an increase should be subject to capital gains tax.

Many people invested in assets in the hope that, one day, there would be a law to reduce liability. People invested in coins, stamps, furniture, paintings and antiques, often in the belief that what is happening today would happen. It is they who will be substantial beneficiaries. I only hope that when the Government's proposed changes are evaluated outside, the majority of people will understand that a very small number will today, as a result of this concession, gain a very large amount of money. That is happening at a time when people at the bottom of the income scale are gaining almost nothing. Indeed, they are losing.

Dr. Marek: I should like to echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said. He encapsulated the debate in his last two sentences. A very few people will make a lot of money from the clause.

Yet again, more Opposition Members than Conservative Members have spoken. One or two Conservative Members have tried valiantly to defend the indefensible, but, by and large, the Conservative Benches have been silent and only Opposition Members have recognised the effect of the tax and been able to deploy the arguments.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) is muttering something. I understand that he is retained by Price Waterhouse. If he wishes to intervene, he should stand up and I shall give way to him.

Mr. Tim Smith: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He cannot have been listening carefully because, to take the example given by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), if a man bought a painting for £100,000 in 1965 and sold it for £550,000 in 1982——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I said £5 million.

6.45 pm

Mr. Smith: Before the clause was introduced, such a man would have been taxed on the whole gain, but the gain is a purely inflationary one. The rate of inflation over the relevant 17-year period was 450 per cent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I said £5 million.

Mr. Smith: I was taking a different example.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman said that he was taking my example.

Mr. Smith: It is unfair that that 450 per cent. gain should be taxed at all.

Dr. Marek: The only thing that I can get out of that intervention is that there must be a lot of paintings hanging in the offices and boardrooms of Price Waterhouse.

Mr. Morgan: Price Watercolours!

Dr. Marek: Indeed. The House should reflect on the alleviation of capital gains tax and compare it with housing benefit. People on income support and those in receipt of housing benefit do not know what will happen to them. Local authorities cannot tell them what will happen. The Government were rightly forced to make changes to their new system.

The Government announced on Budget day that CGT would be rebased on 1982. I maintain that there are only gainers from that change. Moreover, the Government left three weeks for people who pay CGT to arrange their financial affairs to their advantage. The new system came in on 6 April. That sums up the Government's philosophy. The rich—those who pay CGT—know that nothing the Government will do will upset them. Indeed, the Government will ensure that their tax charges diminish. People who depend on social security, income support or housing benefit, however, have all sorts of administrative difficulties put in their way. They do not know how much money they will have to live on next week. They have to keep guessing, but they know that money will be taken away from them each year.

The Committee has been occupied for about three hours considering the case of about one in 100 taxpayers, because that is how many pay CGT. From 1991, each individual will have a CGT allowance of £5,000. Certain married couples will benefit to the tune of £50 million in the coming financial year. The tax-free allowance remains at £5,000, but that should be compared with the single allowance of £2,605. Where is the morality there?

Mr. Boswell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that companies also pay capital gains? They have shareholders —approximately 9 million of them—all of whom are potential capital gains tax payers.

Dr. Marek: I was talking about individuals who pay capital gains on unearned income. There is no fiscal equality in a single allowance for earned income, which involves the loss of leisure time, of £2,605 when the allowance for CGT, which involves no work at all, is £5,000.

Mr. Brooke: It would be helpful if the hon. Gentleman would clear up one matter regarding which we were left in doubt last night. I refer to the Opposition's policy on the capital gains exemption for married couples. The two speeches made by Opposition spokesmen lead in conflicting directions. Is the hon. Gentleman proposing that the exemption for couples should not exist or that there should be only one exemption for everyone?

Dr. Marek: I will not answer that question now, for one good reason. We are here debating a Finance Bill that has not been introduced by the Opposition. I shall be delighted to answer the hon. Gentleman's question in due course, when we are seated on the Government Benches. We are discussing a Finance Bill introduced by the present Conservative Administration—it is their seventh or eighth Bill—and the present proposals before the Committee will give a very few people a very large amount of money. There is no doubt about that.

As to exemption for capital gains between married people, that is a subject of which the ordinary man or women in the street has no comprehension. They have no idea what it is about, and they wonder why the House of Commons spends three or four hours discussing it. The ordinary married couple do not pay capital gains tax and have not even heard of it. Yet the Paymaster General was trying to create a rift over what was said last night by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) where no rift exists. If the right hon. Gentleman will read last night's debate, he will see that the Opposition's case is clear. We oppose massive handouts to wealthy people who do not work for that wealth, and who will enjoy even more wealth as a result of the Bill.

Mr. Brooke: Last night, the two Opposition Members to whom the hon. Gentleman referred gave conflicting interpretations, and he is not prepared to say which of them is correct.

Dr. Marek: I have it directly from the words of my hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and for Islington, South and Finsbury. The comment of the right hon. Gentleman is clearly untrue and there is no rift among the Opposition in expressing its feelings about this iniquitous measure, which creates more riches for those who are already rich.

I return to the subject of the way in which wealthy married couples will benefit from these measures. As each spouse will have their own £5,000 allowance, they will not be able, as they have in the past, to aggregate their gains and losses. However, what is to prevent one spouse from transferring his or her losses by a transfer of assets at nil loss or nil profit to the other spouse, in order to set that loss against the other spouse's gains? I hope that the Paymaster General will pay careful attention to that point, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson). It clearly reveals a flagrant loophole established by the Government in order that wealthy people may evade capital gains tax. Will the Paymaster General close that loophole? Is there to be wide interpretation of artificial transfers? That loophole clearly exists and something should be done about it.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman include in his definition of the wealthy the sons and daughters of people who may have purchased their council houses and bequeathed them to their children? Such beneficiaries may be left with a few thousand pounds, which they choose to invest in stocks and shares—there are some 9 million shareholders in this country. Are they among the "wealthy" whom the hon. Gentleman wants to tax? Will he discriminate against wives and husbands in that way? Many people who might otherwise be Labour voters may wish to know the answers to those questions.

Dr. Marek: There is a simple answer to the hon. Gentleman's submissions, and it is no. I do not need to detain the Committee any further on that point.

Mr. Butterfill: Oh!

Dr. Marek: The answer is clear—it is, no. The hon. Gentleman asked me whether I considered such people to be wealthy. My answer is no, and that ought to be the end of the matter.

I shall now describe to the Committee some of the actions which the Government have taken in relation to the old capital transfer tax, which is now renamed the inheritance tax. I may say, first, that accountancy practices have benefited greatly from the last few years of the Government's various Finance Bills. I am sure that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield will agree. Those firms have paid high salaries to attract staff from the Inland Revenue. I do not know of any particular firm which has done that, but I know that many firms in the aggregate have done so. As a result, many people have left the Inland Revenue, so impoverishing the compliance with tax collection that the Inland Revenue has been able to achieve—particularly in respect of capital gains tax. That is in spite of having lower and lower tax rates, according to the Government.

I am not criticising accountancy firms for doing anything illegal, but the work created for them by the Government is in addition to privatisation issues and public sector business. Therefore, those firms are now extremely profitable. It is interesting to ask which firm is sequestering the assets of the National Union of Seamen and how much that firm is getting out of it. The truth is that capital gains tax is not getting easier as the years go by simply because rates are getting lower or because there will not be any problems as a result of rebasing to 1982. In fact, accountancy firms—I do not object to this—will continue to place great emphasis on devising for their clients the best methods of adjusting their tax affairs.

The answer to it all is not to keep on the track which the Government are following, of giving handouts to the rich, but to try to police the existing tax laws effectively. The Opposition believe that that policing is something to which the Government have not given a great deal of attention. Is it, for example, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's mission in life to provide a living to accountancy firms —[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes!"] No, that should not be the case, but I am glad at last to have the agreement of some Conservative Members. Unfortunately, because of the way in which the Government are formulating their policies, taxes are more and more difficult to apply, with the result that even more livings are to be made by those in accountancy firms working for their clients in avoiding as much capital gains tax as possible.

The provision for rebasing to 1982 is most iniquitous. The point has been made that inflation was 450 per cent. between the time when the tax was introduced in the 1960s until 1982. However, there were many real gains made over and above any inflationary gains. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) made that point and described some of the gross anomalies which exist. One action the Government could have taken was not to make any change whatsoever.

It is the job of Inland Revenue to negotiate with those who wish to make gains by selling their assets at a particular time, in order to achieve a satisfactory valuation. I am sorry to hear that the case of the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), took 12 years to resolve but that is not a criticism of the law—it is a criticism of the way in which the law is interpreted by accountants and by the Inland Revenue. Other ways can be found of ensuring that valuations are arrived at much sooner.

If the Government intended to do anything about capital gains tax before 1982, they should not have swept it away. I reiterate that the Government are giving away a lot of money to a very few people.

I make now my point about the inheritance tax. When that concession is added to the gifts that will be made to people who pass on their estates under the inheritance tax we shall be discussing next, to the cut in the top rate of income tax from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent., to the disaggregation of married couples' incomes—and none of us on the Opposition Benches are against separate taxation for married couples—and to the windfall gains that will be made by wealthy married couples as a result of the proposals, the result is a most iniquitous, thoroughly immoral Budget. Clause 91 is one of its immoral clauses, and we shall vote against it.

[MISS BETTY BOOTHROYD in the Chair]

7 pm

Mr. Brooke: This has been an excellent and enjoyable debate——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The right hon. Gentleman has been well primed.

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Gentleman says, I am looking forward to replying to it.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) raised a number of questions about the consequences and purposes of the clause. It is the clear intention of the clause to unlock gains which will be taxed at higher rates. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) quoted the costs in terms of relief for both individuals and companies in the coming year. He did not quote the £65 million in 1989-90 that we shall secure as a result of the rate change in capital gains tax, or indeed the £15 million that we shall secure as a result of the change to the annual exemption.

The beneficiaries—as the hon. Gentleman said in a side wind—will also be the life insurance companies and the holders of policies in those companies. The hon. Gentleman made much play of the gain that will be made by property companies—and, indeed, the gains of other companies—but, as has been said, those will be taxes in the hands of the shareholders. The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) dismissed that, as though shareholdings were in some way disembodied, and that may well explain what has lain behind much Socialist policy in the past. The fact remains that those gains will be taxed when the individual shareholders realise their own gains.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East mentioned those who might gain. But for higher rate taxpayers generally, the overall capital gains tax reform is likely to be broadly revenue-neutral. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) implied that there would be no losers. Alas, the role of the dodo in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland" cannot be played in terms of these clauses, because unquestionably there will be losers.

I was asked whether I was suggesting that all gains were inflationary. Of course the Government are not saying that, but we cannot return to 1965, for the reasons that we have adduced during the debate.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way, because this question is at the heart of our objections. We accept that in the 1970s inflation created some anomalies, and in an intervention I said that we agreed with the Government that the matter must be dealt with. Surely, however, the Government do not contend that every potential capital gain created in the 1970s was caused by inflation alone. If that is not their contention, what reason can the Government give to the Committee for exempting everything prior to 1982 from tax?

Mr. Brooke: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman heard what I said a moment ago. I agreed that all gains were not inflationary. What I was saying—and I shall say it again—was that the information does not exist to enable us to take indexation back to 1965, which by implication would be the solution that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Darling: Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that no information exists for before 1982? Surely, while it is perfectly possible that information concerning events in 1965 is more difficult to come by, information for 1981, 1979 or 1977 could readily be acquired. If the right hon. Gentleman concedes the principle that there are pre-1982 non-inflationary gains, he could at least have made some attempt to go further back. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) agrees.

Mr. Brooke: I do not know what makes the hon. Gentleman believe that all details in a particular year would readily be available. Some details in each of the years going back to 1965 would be difficult to secure.

Mr. Morgan: The right hon. Gentleman is now adducing a new principle—that there should be no taxation without information, and that taxation is possible only where records exist. Surely that is an incentive for the destruction of records, and the proposal becomes impracticable. Is the right hon. Gentleman really saying that the main motive behind the legislation is the absence of records?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman may well have given me a soubriquet with which I shall go down in history. Our concern, however, is the particular detail that is required to reopen questions back to 1965 in terms of indexation when the information is not universally available. The point that I have made from the beginning of the debate is that indexing back to 1965 is not a feasible proposition because of the lack of available information, and that is the position on which I shall stand.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Brooke: I should like to make a little progress. I shall be on my feet for some time to come.

The hon. Member for Wrexham declined to state the Opposition's position on exemption. Conflicting opinions were given by his hon. Friends——

Mr. Nicholas Brown rose——

Mr. Brooke: I am responding to the hon. Member for Wrexham. He asked me whether I had read the report of the debate. I have had the advantage of reading it, whereas all that he did was to consult his hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). A question remains which the hon. Member for Wrexham noticeably declined to answer. We do not know whether that was because he did not know the answer, or because the Opposition have not yet decided. That question is whether the exemption will be lower for everyone, or whether there will be no exemption for married couples.

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) raised the subject of milk quotas. Two possibilities may arise. Milk quotas are assets that did not exist in 1982: the European Community rules under which they exist were introduced later.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The right hon. Gentleman suggests that there is some confusion, at least in his mind, about Opposition policy on capital gains tax and disaggregation. I think that it is a bit wide of the clause, but if he were to explain precisely what his misunderstanding is, we could deal with it. So far he has alleged inconsistency, but he has not told the House what it is. I suspect that the inconsistency is in his own mind alone, because no one else has picked it up.

Mr. Brooke: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should wish us to explore that further. He will remember that, in the context of the individual's £5,000 exemption, he accused the Government of "not arranging the allowances so that the change is neutral in terms of the public purse."

He may wish later to explain what he meant by that, but it was a statement.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury also said:

"If the Government removed the £5,000 exemption allowance from capital gains tax, we would be entirely and immediately in favour of independent taxation of capital gains."—[Official Report, 9 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 88-111.]

In those circumstances it is reasonable for me to ask whether what they are proposing is no exemption for couples, or a lower exemption for everyone. If they are intending to remove the exemption, that would bring 9 million shareholders under the capital gains tax regime, which require universal tax returns for 30 million people and involve the employment of a further 1,000 to 2,000 Inland Revenue staff.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: There is no inconsistency in that. We are putting proposals to the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) stated something that would be overwhelmingly acceptable and I stated something that I should have thought the Minister would see as being closer to his position. We were not setting out the Labour party's position; we were stating things that the Government should have considered but did not.

Mr. Brooke: I am conscious of the difficulty that the Opposition are having in terms of determining their policy on anything. However, to discuss it in Committee of the whole House during debates on the Finance (No. 2) Bill, with different hon. Members on the Opposition Front Bench putting forward a series of different proposals in order to get a reaction from the Government, seems to be an extraordinary way for Her Majesty's loyal Opposition to go about deciding their policy. It is reasonable for us to seek to know what the policy is, because 9 million shareholders in this country are affected by it.

I shall return to the subject of milk quotas. There are two possibilities. The first, which will more frequently happen, is where a milk quota is disposed of at the same time as the associated farm land. Where that is so, the full benefit of rebasing will, where appropriate, already be available under the Bill. That will be done through the computation of the gain on the farm land itself. Splitting it between the land and the quota will achieve nothing extra.

The second—a more rare occurrence—is where the quota is sold separately from the land. Under Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food arrangements, the Ministry may buy back quota from a dairy farmer under what is known as the outgoers scheme. In those more exceptional circumstances, quota may be disposed of independently of the land. The details are complex, but in some circumstances the payment by the Ministry to the outgoing farmer may take the form of income, in which case there is no question of capital gains tax. In other circumstances, the payment may take the form of capital and a gain may arise. However, that gain is not attributable to any asset that the taxpayer held in 1982. The quota did not exist then and it is an asset separate and entirely distinguishable from the farm land, as is clear from the fact that it can be sold back to the Ministry independently of the land. In giving that answer I am also responding to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry also raised the question of stock dividends. There will be complications when shares issued as a stock dividend are sold if capital gains tax is then payable. However, those complications will not arise for the vast majority of small investors, who will be below the annual exemption.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central asked why we had settled on 1982 for rebasing and not a different year. The reason was, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) said, that market values at 31 March 1982 are already built into the system for indexation. If the hon. Gentleman is asking why the year was fixed at 1982 and not 1979, I should say that that would be a perverse suggestion since there would be a cost to the Revenue in the relief if it had been taken back to the earlier date.

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman seems to be having a great deal of difficulty with the year 1982. Will he explain why 1982 was chosen? There may well have been a cost, but the Government could have done anything they wanted on the matter of indexation. To return to the point made earlier, why is it that before 31 March 1982 information suddenly becomes patchy, whereas after that there is as much information as the Revenue needs?

Mr. Brooke: I remind the hon. Gentleman that 1982 was chosen because the decision was taken in the 1982 Budget. The hon. Gentleman will recall an exchange between his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and myself earlier on the subject of the Labour party amendment which suggested the date 1974. That was also a wholly arbitrary date. The hon. Gentleman will recall that it was withdrawn without debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) supported the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East's point about the 30 per cent. flat rate. He made a most helpful contribution to that subject.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon came back to me on the question of valuation. The hon. Gentleman appears to assume that indexation is computed by reference to disposal value. That is not the case. It is normally computed, under existing law, on market values at 1982. That is the same figure as will be needed for rebasing. The Inland Revenue is experienced in valuing land and other assets at 1982 market values. In spite of the problem in valuation mentioned by the hon. Member for Caernarfon, I noticed that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) appeared to be prepared to value anything.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford for his appreciation of the move by the Government on the subject of the election.

The hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) asked about real versus inflationary profits during the period concerned. I have already spoken about that. In terms of the behaviour of individual shares on the stock market, it would not be practicable to give indexation relief back to 1965. On average, rebasing is no more generous than indexation back to 1965 would be. The hon. Lady also asked about migration. I am glad to say that under the present Government, with lower income tax rates, the number of those leaving the country is likely to be reduced.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), given the historical tendency of the Labour party to argue that our economic success——

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Brooke: I shall come to the speech made by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West attributed the lack of success in the economy during the previous Labour Government to the problems of OPEC and the oil industry. However, the present Opposition attribute all our success to that, despite the fact that the contribution of the oil industry to the revenues of the Treasury is now small, especially after the fall in the oil price.

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield asked about the valuation of shares in 1982 in private companies. It has been suggested that rebasing has an unfair effect where minority shareholders in a private company sell the company jointly. In those circumstances, the sale price will reflect the control premium, whereas the 1982 valuation will be of individual minority shareholdings. This is not really a rebasing point. It concerns how one values shares at a time when there is no sale. The only basis one can use is open market value—the amount that the particular shareholding would have fetched in the market had it been sold. If people have a minority holding, the market will not value it at the premium that would attach to a controlling or 100 per cent. shareholding. Frequently, when people come to sell, they will sell a simple minority holding and the price they receive will reflect that.

I shall study closely what my hon. Friend said in terms of the letter relating to controlling partnerships. If a partnership does own all the shares in a company, it does so as a single entity, no matter how many partners there are. When it comes to selling the shares, the partnership will act as a single investor. The valuation of the shareholding in the market and for tax will be on a controlling holding basis and, as with other assets, each partner will be treated as having a proportionate interest in that value.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North came back to the question about records. It seems that there will be a continuing gulf between the Government and the Opposition on whether the records are available. It remains our contention that they are not.

The hon. Member for Workington, who replied to a question put to me by one of my hon. Friends by saying that he would consult me and write to my hon. Friend later, was, I thought, being unduly modest, as earlier in the debate he knew all the answers to questions put to me.

[Mr. Brooke]

The hon. Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, North and for Wrexham referred to the tax on transfers between husbands and wives. We have established ourselves as the party of the family through our proposals relating to independent taxation. The Opposition will be the party of the anti-family, if they are going to introduce taxation on transactions between husbands and wives.

Even after all the changes to capital gains tax since 1979, the yield on disposals this year by individuals and trusts will be about three times the equivalent for 1978-79, which is a real increase of more than 50 per cent. Most of the cost of rebasing lies with companies. Even so, the yield on disposals by companies this year is seven times greater in real terms than the yield in 1978-79.

I rest my case on a final verdict about these proposals. The Institute for Fiscal Studies set up a working party on capital taxes, which in February produced an interim report on reforming capital gains tax. While considering the options for reform open to the Chancellor, the institute happened on what was effectively the Budget package—1982 rebasing, charging gains as the marginal slice of income, a basic rate of 25 per cent. and a single higher rate of 40 per cent. It commented:

"Clearly such a scheme has much to commend it. It would also seem to be the logical counterpart in the personal sector to the reform made in the 1987 Budget in the corporate sector . . . The main objection . . . is that the key problem . . . with CGT is left unremedied, namely its complexity. Still, it cannot be a valid objection to a sensible reform package that it is not perfect."

I commend the proposals to the House.

Clause 128

GIFTS TO POLITICAL PARTIES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Dr. Marek: On a point of order, Miss Boothroyd. I was under the impression that we were going to discuss clause 127. In the general hubbub and melee of hon. Members exiting from the Chamber, it appears that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who told me that he would take four minutes to open the debate on clause 127, did not catch your eye. I wonder whether he could raise a further point of order on this matter.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I am very understanding about and sympathetic to the hon. Member's point of order, but I think that my voice is very clear. It was quiet in the Chamber when I put the Question, and there was no objection to it. Clause 127 has been agreed to.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): Further to the point of order, Miss Boothroyd. Is it correct to say that clause 127 could have been dealt with even if it was not moved?

The Second Deputy Chairman: I put the Question on the clause. I looked towards the Minister, who did not move.

[The Second Deputy Chairman]

I then looked towards the Opposition Front Bench and waited for an hon. Member to respond. There was no move to speak. The Question on the clause has been put and the clause has been accepted. If hon. Members on the Government Front Bench do not rise when the Chairman looks their way, there is nothing that the Chair can do about it. Clause 127 has been passed. We are dealing with clause 128. Does the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) wish to speak on clause 128?

Dr. Marek: Further to the point of order, Miss Boothroyd. We need an explanation from the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Mr. Lennox-Boyd), who was trying to get the Economic Secretary not to rise. I certainly saw the hon. Gentleman do that.

The Second Deputy Chairman: If an hon. Member tries to get another hon. Member to remain seated, that has nothing to do with the Chair. The Question on clause 127 has been put. There was an opportunity for Ministers to rise. No one did. Clause 127 has been accepted. We are now dealing with clause 128.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Further to the point of order, Miss Boothroyd. I do not know whether it is appropriate for Back Benchers to oppose a clause. I said no, with some hesitancy because I was looking at the Opposition Front Bench. I suppose that I said no with my normal accent, which people say is very soft-spoken.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Any hon. Member can oppose a clause. I have perfect hearing. I am not sitting in the upper Chair which has wings that prevent my hearing. I heard no opposition to the clause.

Mr. Lilley: Further to that point of order, Miss Boothroyd. May I make it clear that I did not want to deprive the Opposition of the opportunity to have a debate. Is it possible within the rules of the House of Commons for us to interpret broadly the meaning of clause 128, so that we can cover the topics in clause 127, which are essentially the same, since they involve inheritance tax? Perhaps we can do that, if it is agreeable to the Opposition.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The hon. Member has a sympathetic way of putting things to me. I think that that course would be very agreeable.

Dr. Marek: I thank the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, although I suspect that the real culprit is the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale, who never says anything in the Chamber. I unreservedly thank the Economic Secretary for suggesting that course and I thank you, Miss Boothroyd, for accepting the Economic Secretary's suggestion that we have a wide debate. Of course, we shall not be able to vote on clause 127, since we are technically on clause 128, but we will be able to have a debate on it. It is important that the country should understand the Opposition's reservations about the changes in inheritance tax and in respect of gifts to political parties.

I must now depart from the all-party accord that has developed over the past few minutes, to focus on the points of dissent on this issue. We must focus on the super-rich because, I say again, this is exactly what the Budget is about. It is about benefits for the super-rich at the expense of the poor getting poorer. We certainly will not talk in this debate about cuts in income tax from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent., about the disaggregation of income tax and the massive windfall gains that will come to the super-rich because of that. We will not talk about the separate nil rate bands for capital gains tax, because, yet again, those separate bands will produce a massive windfall for the super-rich. We will certainly not talk about the other opportunities for this very small, exclusive class of people in the business expansion scheme and the associated new Rachmanism that it will introduce. We will talk about taxes on wealth, the inheritance tax and gifts to political parties.

The same scandalous picture emerges, because the top rate band of inheritance tax is to be reduced from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent. It is true that the lower rate of 30 per cent. will be increased to 40 per cent., but, because of the increase in thresholds from £90,000 to £110,000, no one at that level will lose. It is true that they will not gain and that the people who will gain a lot are the massively wealthy. They are the people who will be able to benefit political parties under clause 128.

There will be a further polarisation of wealth in a country in which 1 per cent. of the super-rich own a quarter of all private wealth. That figure beggars the imagination. In the last two years the number of people paying inheritance tax has halved, from 40,000 to 20,000, and this Budget will give even more real money to the very few and privileged. Only 5,200 taxpayers paid inheritance tax last year at rates above 40 per cent. The estates averaged £475,000. After this Budget, the same people will on average save £29,000 each—a loss to the Exchequer of from £150 million to perhaps £200 million.

What could the Government have done with that £150 million? They could certainly have built more hospitals, roads, houses and schools. They could have rejuvenated a substantial part of the infrastructure of the country. They chose not to do that. They chose to give it away to people who are already so wealthy that I do not think that they know what their wealth is or can comprehend it.

Because of this Budget, the saving on an estate of £1 million is £148,000. What possible rationale, morality or justification can there be in giving that sum to those super-rich people, especially when their position is compared to that of the only moderately wealthy? To a person who leaves an estate worth £250,000 this Budget gives a saving of only £6,000. There again, one can detect the rationale of this Budget. The poor get nothing from it; it is all taken away from them through social security cuts and cuts in public expenditure. The moderately wealthy get just a bit, a few pickings; they get £6,000 on an estate worth £250,000. But people who are really wealthy, the super-rich, get everything that can be given to them by this immoral Government.

Inheritance taxes are expected to raise just 2 per cent. of total tax receipts in 1987-88. Let us compare that with previous figures. Between the wars, inheritance tax and capital transfer tax, or its predecessor, estate duty, raised 15 per cent. Before the first world war they raised 30 per cent. That is yet another indication of what the Government are doing: consistently reducing the percentage of taxes and taxation paid by the rich in estate duty and inheritance tax.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Would the hon. Gentleman like to remind the Committee what the rate of income tax was before the first world war so that it can make a true comparison of the contribution of estate duty or capital transfer tax before 1914 and currently?

Dr. Marek: It was very low, and it went up, as the hon. Gentleman will surely know, because of the world wars. Income tax has gone up and expenditure taxes have gone up, because we must remember that in 1979 the percentage of gross domestic product taken in taxation was 34 per cent. and it is now 38 per cent., showing quite clearly that the Tory party is the taxing party. Income tax has gone up and inheritance tax has gone down. Capital taxes have gone down and taxes for which one does not have to work or sacrifice one's leisure, which provide privilege and which give one power, have gone down. But taxes on earned income, for which one has to work and sacrifice one's leisure, have gone up. That is the immorality of the Government's case.

The Government have given up all pretence of governing in the interests of all the country and trying to be equitable. They have given up all pretence of taxing people justly and on a moral basis.

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), in the previous debate, praised the capital gains tax as being progressive. He is not present now, but I wonder what he would have thought of this measure by the Government, who have abolished the progressive scale of inheritance tax and replaced it by a flat rate, rather similar to the poll tax. I would put it even more strongly. The Government are stealing the nation's money. It is money that should be in the hands of one-parent families, should be used to increase child benefit properly in line with inflation, should be given to the unemployed or old-age pensioners, should be given to retired couples by not cutting their housing benefit, and should be used for building the hospitals, schools, houses and roads that the country so desperately needs.

It is true that the Government have given a little to the ordinary working man and woman by cutting the basic rate of income tax from 27p to 25p, but they have given most of it to the wealthy and the super rich in this measure.

Mr. Butterfill: I do not think that any of us would disagree about the desirability of spending money on many of the things that the hon. Member has suggested, but surely that money can be spent only if it is first earned. If we were to do as he wants and stop this clause going through, surely that would destroy some of the businesses in this country that create the money to provide taxation to enable money to be spent on the things that he considers desirable. Surely he appreciates that in many cases inheritance tax is paid by family businesses.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman's latter point may be true, but I wonder how this tax and its cutting create money. I do not think that it creates any money at all. It is merely a way of passing wealth from one generation to another and encouraging the second generation to be idle and to live on their accumulated wealth.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Friends of mine in America who study these matters say that that is the general view there. We now have one generation keeping the next, which in turn is keeping the next, because of the way that wealth is being transferred down through generations. The only way that we can stop that and restore the enterprise culture in the way that it should be restored is to bring in stringent inheritance taxes whereby each generation has some incentive to do a day's work.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend makes the point extremely well. There can be no rationale for only a 40 per cent. flat rate inheritance tax no matter how wealthy a person is.

There is no question of the Government saying that they are taking this step because they want to attract top people to the United Kingdom to run our industry better than we can ourselves or to create wealth. There is no question of reducing the tax simply to increase incentive. It will not increase incentive for anybody. My hon. Friend is right. We can argue about incentives with regard to the top rate of income tax. We may have different views on that, but at least there is an argument. In this case there is no argument.

The Government have no excuse for lowering the top rate of inheritance tax. They cannot say that it will provide a net increase in revenue for the Treasury. We have heard arguments for cutting income tax based on the premise that eventually the net tax collected will increase and the Revenue will benefit. However, I do not think that the Chief Secretary will try to adduce that as an argument. That is not the case. This is a straightforward robbery of the people.

In a press release from the Treasury—I hope that quoting it will not prevent my receiving press releases in future—the Economic Secretary says:

> "Real tax revenue up following cuts in tax rates".

That is patently not true for inheritance tax. He says:

> "Father Pedro Navarette put it rather pithily when he warned rulers: 'He who imposes high taxes receives from very few.'"

Unfortunately, he who raises the thresholds and provides all manner of loopholes also receives very little from the very few, and that is what is happening here. Two years ago 40,000 people paid inheritance tax and 20,000 paid it last year. Even fewer will pay this year and there will be a net loss to the Revenue of £200 million. On top of that net loss to the Revenue is all the immorality associated with allowing people to pass on extreme wealth from one generation to another. The clause is morally offensive, and the Government know it.

Let me look at the history of the capital transfer tax, gifts to political parties and the new inheritance tax. I do not want to take too long about this, but in the Finance Act 1980 there was a reduction in the rates and an increase in some of the exemptions. In the Finance Act 1981 there was a further reduction in lifetime rates and an introduction of a 10-year cumulation period so that after 10 years one was free of tax. There was an increase in the annual exemption to £3,000. There were improvements in the position of agricultural property and there was an extension of transitional relief for the discretionary trusts.

Let us go forward one more year. In the Finance Act 1982 there was a further reduction in the rates and indexation of the bands. Again, there were amendments to discretionary trusts, alleviating charges still further. There was nothing in the Finance Act 1983, which may have been because of the election. In the Finance Act 1984 there was a further reduction in the rates. Something must have happened to the Finance Act 1985 as happened to our debate on clause 127 a short while ago—nothing.

[Dr. Marek]

In the Finance Act 1986—here we go again—the capital transfer tax was replaced by the inheritance tax. It abolished the charge on lifetime gifts made more than seven years before death. Then, in the Finance Act 1987, there was a further reduction in the rates. This year, 1988, there is a further massive reduction in the rates and there is no justification in morality for it. Those activities of the Government are reprehensible and that is one reason why we want to debate clauses 127 and 128.

Before I close I want to refer to a document from Peat Marwick McLintock on Budget changes, with the headline:

"Inheritance tax: making the most of the changes".

That is followed by two closely typed pages on how not a lot of people—20,000 at most—can make the most of the changes. They are the only people who will be paying inheritance tax and there will be fewer than 20,000 people paying inheritance tax in the coming year.

I have a document on inheritance tax from Price Waterhouse entitled "Planning for Inheritance Tax". That was valid in October 1986, so I leave it to the judgment of hon. Members what such a document will say after this Finance Bill. It says:

"For the first time since 1974, estate owners have the opportunity of passing an unlimited amount of property to later generations free of tax."

Then there is a word of caution:

"No one can be certain how long the present inheritance tax regime will last; it may not survive a change of government."

Well, Miss Boothroyd, you bet it will not survive a change of Government.

The document goes on to give many examples. For example, it says:

"it may be possible for a married couple to minimise risk by arranging for the spouse with the longer life expectancy to make a potentially exempt transfer . . . A transfer from, say, husband to wife followed by a gift to the recipient, may be in order".

So will the topping up by £20,000 of a nil-band trust. That has probably occurred to those people who pay inheritance tax. There is another page with about half a dozen tips on how to save thousands, tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of pounds because of the changes that the Government have introduced in the Finance Bill.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Surely the firm of accountants is showing how sensible tax planning can be organised. That would apply whatever cut-off or threshold level there was for inheritance tax. It has nothing particularly to do with the Budget proposals. The Labour party is proposing to penalise those who have begun to amass assets, which it would tax penally upon death and transfer to the descendants.

Dr. Marek: I am not accusing the accountants of doing anything immoral or wrong. It is extremely useful that we have accounting firms which are able to set out clearly and lucidly all the advantages and loopholes that the Government have been able to create for the extremely wealthy. The 60 per cent. top rate on inheritance tax was not a penal rate.

I think that I have said enough to show the Committee that yet once again——

Mr. Beith: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to refer to other aspects of the clause which relate to political parties?

8 pm

Dr. Marek: I will do that, but briefly.

The Government are fearless in their regard for the rich and the super-rich; they want to enable them to become richer, to retain their wealth and to pass it on to succeeding generations, paying as little tax as possible in the process.

As to gifts to political parties, I have very little to say As I understand it, the limit has been abolished. Anyone can make a contribution to a political party on his or her deathbed without having to pay tax. Previously the contribution had to be made at least a year before death for it to be tax-free. Again, the measure will benefit the Conservative party. I do not think that members of the Labour party or of the SLDP, by and large, will be able to contribute well over £100,000 to political parties. The Opposition will not benefit much from clause 128, but the Conservative party will benefit. I suspect it will benefit because basically Conservatives are mean and nasty people, present company excepted. They do not want to contribute their money until they are on their deathbeds; that is why the Government have introduced the clause.

Of course, there is hope here for the Opposition. If Conservatives do not want to give the money away until they are on their deathbeds, it means that they cannot believe in the measures which the Government have produced for us. We will vote against clause 128. I am grateful to you, Miss Boothroyd, for allowing the debate to range widely.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): It is within the immediate recollection of the Committee over the last few minutes that events do not always transpire precisely as the Committee would have wished. I say to the Opposition that I am sorry that we cannot debate clause 127 in the form in which the Committee had expected. I am grateful to you, Miss Boothroyd, for the opportunity within the rules of order to refer to matters related to clause 127 in so far as they impinge on clause 128. I hope that you will allow a liberal interpretation of that, although I express my regrets to the Opposition that procedural technicalities will now deny them the right to vote on clause 127. Perhaps I may acknowledge at the outset that we are aware of the objections to clause 127 that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has set out cogently and clearly, and we shall certainly accept their vote in opposition even though it has not in practice been delivered and cannot now be delivered.

I shall direct my remarks principally to clause 128, and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, who with good fortune will later catch your eye, Miss Boothroyd, will endeavour to respond to the important points made by the hon. Member for Wrexham and to any other related points that you consider to be within the rules of order.

As the hon. Member for Wrexham said, clause 128 deals effectively with the one-year exemption point for donations to political parties. It is essentially directed to a very narrow point of tax law and seeks to remove an anomaly. Although he expressed it amusingly, the hon. Gentleman felt that the clause might offer financial benefit to the Conservative party, though perhaps not to other parties. My inquiries reveal that the Inland Revenue, so far as records determine, cannot trace a single donation to benefit a political party that would be affected by the provisions of the clause.

The clause abolishes the £100,000 limit for inheritance tax exemption for gifts to political parties made at, or within, one year of the death of the donor. The practical effect of the clause is to make all gifts to political parties entirely free of tax rather than, as at present, simply those made more than a year before the death of the donor. That means that no longer will tax be payable if the donor dies 364 days after making the donation but not if he lives one day longer, or two days in the case of a leap year. It does not admit any new or novel principle of tax law, although it re-establishes a traditional one. The reason for gifts being exempt if made one year or more before death is simply that they were being made for public purposes. That has been the position for many years. That, of course, is equally true even if the donor dies speedily after his generosity has been announced.

The clause also restores the parity of tax treatment which has existed traditionally between gifts to bona fide political parties—I will touch on the definition in a moment—and charities. A bona fide political party is defined as one with either two Members elected to the House of Commons or one Member elected and 150,000 votes cast to candidates of that party.

[SIR PAUL DEAN in the Chair]

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister will be aware that the Labour Research Department and other organisations do interesting work on contributions made by industry to the Conservative party. I know of no contributions to the Labour party on that scale and I doubt whether there are many to the alliance. Are there many contributions of that nature to the Conservative party? Does the Minister expect an increase in those contributions? What kind of people give more than £100,000 to the Conservative party? Are they mad?

Mr. Major: If I may say so, not only are they not mad, but, so far as I can determine, they do not exist. I shall come in a few moments to the point, which I agree is relevant.

I shall turn first to what some may think is a curious link between gifts to political parties and gifts to charities. That is not a novel proposition. The link has existed, with minor breaks, since the 19th century and has been accepted during that period by Governments of all political complexions, sometimes alone and sometimes in partnership with other political parties. Indeed, it was most recently specifically re-endorsed by the Labour Government in 1975.

Mr. Beith: The Minister may say that the link is traditional, but did it not require an amendment which, as I recall, was supported by my friend, John Pardoe, to bring it about in the Finance Act 1975?

Mr. Major: It is correct that there was an amendment to the Finance Act 1975 because there had been an unintended change in the treatment of charities and political parties between 1972 and 1975. The 1975 amendment did precisely the same in principle as is being done by clause 128, which restores the parity of treatment between charities and political parties which had drifted apart in favour of charities.

I promised the Committee a moment ago that I would deal further with the definition of political parties. Having set out the definition, for the purpose of the record, perhaps I should record that the definition embraces not only the Government party and the principal Opposition party, but also the Labour and Co-operative party, the Social and Liberal Democratic party, the Social Democratic party, the Scottish National party, Plaid Cymru, the Ulster Unionists, the Democratic Unionists and the Social Democratic and Labour party, all of which, for the purposes of the clause, are bona fide political parties. It is an extensive list.

As to the point that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised a few moments ago, I should say, for the avoidance of doubt, that donations of a size to benefit from the change, that is to say, £100,000 or more, are rare. I have not been able to locate a single occasion on which there has been a revenue loss to the Exchequer because of a donation of that size.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) rose——

Mr. Major: I shall give way in a second.

I perhaps anticipate the question still lingering in the mind of the hon. Member for Workington. The fact that there do not seem to have been such donations is no reason why we should retain on the statute book an unnecessary and anomalous inhibition to such gifts, if donors wish to make them. That inhibition has arisen by accident, not design, and deserves to be removed.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister correctly anticipated the question. Might it not be the case that there is no expected Exchequer loss and no gifts of over £100,000 being made at the moment precisely because of the limit of £100,000 before taxation applies? Is there anticipation of loss to the Exchequer from the changes being introduced in the clause?

Mr. Major: That would be relevant only if the donor expected to die within a year of making the gift. As far as I am aware, there have been no donations of that size by people who expected to live for substantially longer than a year, so the underlying point that the hon. Gentleman made was answered by my remarks a few moments ago.

From 1894 to 1972—to come to the point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith)—gifts to charities and political parties were treated alike for the purposes of estate duty. That was at no stage a matter of political controversy or fiscal abuse. In 1972, the Conservative Government introduced a special relief, exclusively for gifts to charities. They exempted gifts up to £50,000, even if they were made within a year of death, and, for the first time, broke that long-standing parity of treatment.

It did not stay broken for long, for the reason given by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. When the Labour Government introduced capital transfer tax in 1975, they doubled the then £50,000 exemption limit and restored once again complete parity between political and charitable gifts, which is the precise intent of clause 128. Subsequent increases in the exemption limit applied only to charities, thus breaking the link again.

These words do not pass my lips often, but I believe that the Labour Government were correct in 1975. There is no reason to discriminate against political parties in this way. They removed that discrimination and were right to do so.

[Mr. Major]

This clause proposes to emulate that excellent example and restore the parity of tax treatment that existed for many years under both Labour and Conservative Governments.

Dr. Marek: I happen to have the Committee report of 5 February 1975. Replying, I think, to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was moving an amendment, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Mr. Barnett, said:

"We want our political parties to be influenced by the great majority of people who subscribe to the faith of a party, not giving excessive influence to a small number of people who can subscribe large sums."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 5 February 1975; c. 930.]

That is the essence of our argument against clause 128.

Mr. Major: I entirely understand that that is the essence of the argument that the noble Lord Barnett advanced in Standing Committee. However, it is also on record that on Report he introduced an amendment of a quite different sort. It restored the parity which had previously existed and which had precisely the same effect as clause 128. On reflection, between Committee and Report, the noble Lord and his right hon. and hon. Friends of the day clearly reached the same conclusion as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor when he decided to put clause 128 in the Bill. So there is unanimity of view between the noble Lord Barnett—and, no doubt, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer—and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Such unanimity is not regularly reached and the Committee should note it with some pleasure.

The underlying point, accepted then as now, is that, just as there can be no justification for the Exchequer creaming off a slice of an individual's bequest to a charity, the Exchequer should not benefit if that individual chooses to leave money instead to a political party. That is something that we in this place should understand as well as most. The anomaly that has arisen over the years is unjustifiable. That is why we have chosen to end it in the Bill.

8.15 pm

Gifts to charities and political parties had parity of treatment for more than three quarters of a century. When that was broken in favour of charities in 1972, the then Labour Government restored parity in 1975. It has since been broken again in favour of charities and this clause once more establishes parity and the symmetry of legislation passed by past Labour Governments and the present Conservative Government. I therefore commend clause 128 to the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Tonight, I wish to say something about the more personal aspects of this issue. I am openly hostile to the principle of inheritance, which I believe borders on the morally wrong. I understand that millions of people in this country feel that they should have the right to pass on wealth from one generation to another. It may well be that society should allow people to transfer wealth in small amounts from one generation to the next.

When I was a young man, I had an argument with my parents, and it has lasted for many years. It is relevant to today's discussion. It arose, after I joined the Labour party in 1965, from my view that every generation had a self-standing responsibility to make its own way, and that society should give people the maximum opportunity and incentives to go out and do a fair day's work for a fair day's pay—and to join the free market and develop businesses. That is why I have consistently supported the Government over the years whenever I have felt that measures they were introducing would help small businesses.

The argument I had with my parents was about whether it was right for people to inherit. I announced 23 years ago to my family that I did not want to inherit anything from them, although in 1960 I received, to my eternal regret, £100 from an aunt. That was probably worth £800 or £900 in today's money, and it has compromised me down a lifetime.

I have stood by my view and today I stand to lose a substantial inheritance from my family. Every generation must be absolutely free-standing and should not receive wealth from previous generations. People must go out and make the effort and be given every incentive and opportunity in life. I know of friends who have not enjoyed the experience that I have, who knew that they stood to inherit large amounts of money later in life. Some of them have not done what they could have done because they knew they would inherit one day, so they lost the incentive to go out and make an effort themselves.

I know that this view is not uniquely held by people of my political persuasion. There are many Conservative families in this country who own large amounts of wealth but who are opposed to inheritance for precisely the reason that I oppose it. They know that effort is the way to build society. It is often people who are born into articulate, middle-class circumstances who are capable of going out into the world to make an effort and develop businesses.

Mr. Beith: A good friend of mine who is a Liberal and a successful small business man held the same view as the hon. Gentleman. It led him to decide he would pass on none of the money he had made to his children but that he should educate them privately—in this he differed from my view—and give them the best possible start in life. From the moment that they were 18 they would not receive a penny more from him. That shows that the hon. Gentleman's view has wide currency.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am grateful for that example of support.

I shall not identify them, but I have discussed this matter privately with Conservative Members on a number of occasions and I know that some of them will go a long way down this road with me. It would be wrong to identify them. I know that tonight they will vote with the Government in favour of cuts in this tax, in the knowledge that, as a result of this Budget, many people will inherit more money.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman recognises the great importance in any economy of incentives to work, and he has also mentioned the importance of incentives for enterprise to start one's own business. Does he recognise that, rightly or wrongly, many people do not work for themselves but for the younger generation? If we were to remove the possibility of people accumulating money for the benefit of their children, human nature being what it is, we would remove a substantial element of incentive for work and enterprise, from which society benefits.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have also discussed that matter within my family and with many others. I do not accept that proposition. What happens is that people who have made money, or who are acquiring wealth, seek to justify what they are doing, and they use that as an excuse. They say, "I am doing it for you and for those who follow me." They have to find some justification for this acquisition of wealth. I do not say it to my children. I do not see why the hon. Gentleman, if he has children, would say it to them. If he did not have children, is it not possible that life might be just as exciting and that he might equally find incentives for going out there, generating wealth and making money? Is he saying that if he did not have children, he would not work as hard?

Mr. Davies: I believe that if we remove the possibility of human beings working for the next generation, we remove the major incentive that has led to human beings, down the millenia, accumulating capital. Without it, we would not have had any economic progress and we would still be in our caves.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to add a new strand to his argument, but he just repeated what he had already said. In my family, that motive has no bearing on the willingness, the eagerness or the desire of people to go out and create wealth. It had none when I made my announcement to them. They set out to do other things with their money, and my family is making provision for education in south Wales, through a trust. I am pleased that that is being done. That is the kind of choice that people should be making when they acquire wealth. They should be saying that they want to contribute to society, and should not think exclusively in terms of handing it over to their children, because they never understand when they do that what damage can be done to the forthcoming generation.

I see the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) shaking his head. We will not go into his personal circumstances, but I am sure that he would wish to intervene in the debate, were he not a Government Whip, to clarify the matter for us. People try to justify the acquisition of wealth on the basis that they will hand it on to the next generation, when there are perfectly acceptable reasons and incentives for people to create wealth.

I do not know how far we shall go with this argument, but I was told that Jeffrey Archer—an eminent journalist and author among other things—has made similar provisions and has made similar statements to mine, although I might be wrong. I am told that he is a model of entrepreneurial success, and it might be that he understands my argument. I know that there are Conservative Members who understand this argument, and it might be that he and others recognise that when one transfers wealth down through the generations, not only does the generation that accepts it sometimes lose the incentive to create wealth on its own account, but often passes the lack of incentive down to another generation and the damage can often be done within that generation, to the grandchildren. Often, they were not present when the wealth was made in the first place and they do not understand the mechanics, and often the pain and the sacrifice, of the people who generated the wealth.

We have all had these experiences—they are not exclusively known to Conservative Members. I understand what happens during that period, because I have seen it within my generation. Before Conservative Members vote tonight—no doubt they will be herded into the Lobby, although there have been some complications—they should think carefully. The Conservative party is not giving due consideration to what this argument is about. I understand that it maintains that it is the party of enterprise and of the entrepreneur. I lay claim to that title for the Labour party, because the Labour party understands the fundamental principle that to have true entrepreneurial endeavour we must ensure that the incentives are there. The way that the Government have gone about capital transfer tax and inheritance tax shows clearly that they do not understand that principle.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): The hon. Gentleman seems to feel that the sole and only point of wealth is to enrich the individual, although he stressed that the individual who passes it on can use it for other purposes. The same applies with wealth that has been transmitted, and I have two obvious examples. A friend of mine is a missionary on an unpaid basis in Africa, and he would not be able to do that if he had not inherited money from his parents. To take an example closer to home, I have worked for a family business that was all the more successful and close-knit precisely because the ownership of that business had been passed from father to son. This change in the legislation will make it possible for that to continue.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There will always be exceptions to the rule, and I think that we can accommodate them by rejigging the law, perhaps not in the way that the Government would want. I put to the Committee what I am told is a fact—that in Japan, the level of inheritance tax is extraordinarily high. The Chief Secretary shakes his head, so perhaps my information is wrong. I am told that it is very high, but the Japanese manage to succeed industrially.

I am sure that there are lessons to be learned, if not from the Japanese, from what is happening in America. Inevitably, when the Americans realise the damage caused to society by the way that wealth is being transferred down the generations, they may react and deal with it. If we do not do so, it will be the cancer that undermines the whole of our economic activity in the future.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised interesting questions that have to be considered by Conservative Members who seek to strengthen those aspects of our culture that support enterprise. I would not draw the same conclusions as the hon. Gentleman and I shall argue that there is a different way to tackle the problem. There is a tension inherent in the Government's philosophy, between their desire to encourage enterprise and the belief that people must stand on their own feet and the preservation within our society of large amounts of inheritance, which concentrates wealth among relatively small numbers of people.

Most of us must have had the experience that the hon. Gentleman has had of knowing people who have inherited in circumstances that have led them to do less well in their lives than they might otherwise have done.

We know of businesses which went wrong in the second or third generation, or the estate that went to seed because the person who originally built it up did not pass on with the estate the qualities of personality and commitment which had enabled him to build it up in the first place.

[Mr. Beith]

In contrast, the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) has given examples of businesses which have benefited from being passed down through a family, and which have carried through the family a certain commitment to the employees which would not be at variance with the Government's philosophy, which is based on the belief that the family, having benefited, has an obligation to those who have worked for it for successive generations. Sometimes the employees also go from one generation to another.

8.30 pm

The Government do not seem to be addressing that important philosphical issue. They seem content to maintain the broad structure of capital taxation while easing its impact through the changes in inheritance tax that we are discussing on clause 128, instead of considering more radically what could be done to our capital taxation.

I hope that the hon. Member for Workington will support the argument that we have put to the Government for years—that radical changes in the taxation of capital transfer would encourage the wider distribution of wealth. We submit that the best way to do that would be by an accessions tax the burden of which falls upon the recipient and which would be graduated and have thresholds to ensure that people could receive relatively small legacies without suffering a tax penalty, but would have to pay tax on larger amounts.

Therefore, the donor would have an incentive to spread the wealth more widely, because the effective method of tax avoidance would be to distribute the gifts amongst the largest number of recipients. Whether they are members of the family, friends, good causes or whatever, the wider the gifts are distributed, the less likely is any one recipient to fall within the threshold. Such a tax should also have a cumulative effect so that any recipient should have receipts other than those from the one donor taken into account. That, too, would help to ensure that the wealth was more widely spread.

Instead, the Government are preserving a taxation system that appears to be a macabre lottery because of the seven-year rule that tax can be avoided entirely if death can be predicted. It would be hard to find a better case for bringing in President Reagan's astrologer than seeking advice on how to dispose of gifts by predetermining the time of death.

Why cannot the Government espouse the radical reforming zeal which the Chancellor wishes to have attached to his name in history and make some real attempt to change the capital taxation system so that it encourages the wider distribution of wealth with minimum pain and disincentive? The argument for reducing income tax levels is based primarily on incentives that the Government seem to recognise more readily at the top of the scale than at the bottom of the scale. It is based on the idea that taxing people at the point at which they are earning more money poses a very real disincentive. There is not the same powerful disincentive if people are taxed at the point at which they are receiving windfall gains, if the tax system is so organised that the person who can give away large amounts of money will do it more widely and a much better social purpose will be served as a result.

Therefore, we argue—we have tabled amendments to this effect—that there should be an accessions tax rather than an inheritance tax, and over the years we have set out ways in which that can be done.

We are also discussing exemption from inheritance tax relating to political parties. The Minister made a rather good case as he picked his way through the history of this matter. As I pointed out to him in an intervention, my former colleague Mr. John Pardoe was involved in seeking to bring about the limit which the Government now seek to abolish.

When I looked at the clause before tonight's debate, I considered the £100,000 to be a threshold and I believe that it was argued in those terms in 1975. Therefore, it would not be true to say that political parties and charities were put on a precisely equal footing. There was a difference between them which became more significant as time passed. Political parties effectively were frozen at the £100,000 threshold on tax liability for gifts made at or within one year of the donor's death. Charities had no such limit.

There is a case for a distinction between political parties and charities. I do not believe that it is a very strong case, as I regard political activity, which is primarily a voluntary activity, as analogous to charitable work in many ways. In a democracy, we ought not to regard political activity as being of less value than other voluntary activities in other areas of the law where such an argument is relevant. In a democracy it behoves us to recognise political activity.

That is why I believe that political work, particularly voluntary political work, should not be excluded from the honours system. I have more sympathy for those who engage voluntarily in political work than I have with the knights of the shires on the Conservative Back Benches. They should be regarded as eligible for recognition for their voluntary work as are those who engage voluntarily in other aspects of public life.

The argument for a distinction or a threshold is that by definition charities do not represent political causes which can be advantaged by getting larger sums of money than other political causes. The argument may be weighted by the amount of money that is available to one political party. There seems to me merit in the threshold. It is almost certainly true, as has been argued, that the fact that recently there have been no gifts above the threshold may well be because people are pitching their gifts appropriately inside the threshold. Therefore, there is an argument for drawing a distinction between political parties and charities at the point at which gifts become very large.

I am bound to say that the history of the matter is sufficiently tortuous and complicated to give the Minister something of a leg to stand on when he says that the Government to some extent are redressing an anomaly by choosing to put the matter in the Bill in that form. I shall be very interested to hear what other views are expressed during the debate. I cannot advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the principle that gifts to political parties should be in a wholly different category from those to charities and that the whole principle should be opposed on those grounds.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): I shall crave your indulgence, Sir Paul, in addressing most of my remarks to the clause that is not before the Committee, and I hope that I shall be in order.

The effect of the two clauses is principally to simplify the way in which the inheritance tax operates. To that extent they are greatly to be welcomed. We have had much talk about the morality of inheritance tax, and indeed much talk about the morality of inheritance. The morality of inheritance tax, when the tax is complex and when the rates are very high, is the morality of avoidance; it is the ability of a whole industry to advise those who have accumulated a certain amount of wealth on the best and most efficient manner of passing on what wealth.

I turn to the remarks of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) about the effects of inherited wealth. I have a great deal of sympathy with his view that there are many well-recorded instances when the inheritance of wealth in the wrong fashion—sometimes too early—has caused the recipient of that wealth not to achieve his potential success in life. I would also point out that there are many instances in history, and I suspect in the present, of the inheritance of wealth having been of great benefit to society. Indeed, one does not have to look much further than the great philosophers of the 19th century. One can go back even further to philosophers such as Montaigne, who were able to do such great work purely because they could devote their energies to study because they had inherited wealth. They provided all of us with the benefits of that study.

I accept that inherited wealth is bad for the individual in some instances, but there are many instanees in which it has a good effect.

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that if philosophers inherit wealth it enables them to pursue their studies. Does he think that the fact that Ludwig Wittgenstein gave away his entire fortune in any way impaired his ability to philosophise?

Mr. Carrington: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making my point. Wittgenstein would have been unable to make the decision to give away his great wealth unless he had had that great wealth initially, which gave him time to study. I agree that he came to a parodoxical conclusion, but that was equally true of his writings.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman expressed sympathy for, if not agreement with, my views. Does he accept that those who make good use of what they have received could equally have been provided for if the transfer of money from one generation to theirs had been by way of indirect payment? In other words, they would not be direct recipients, after tax, of these moneys. Another arrangement would have to be provided.

Mr. Carrington: The hon. Gentleman opens up many possibilities about the way in which those whom society considers, on the whole, to be worthy of funding could be funded. That is true of authors and poets as well as of philosophers and, to some extent, scientists. When passing on wealth, one has to decide who is to be the beneficiary. History tells us that, unfortunately, political power and censorship have played a very unwelcome role by curbing the advances that society might otherwise have made. I accept that there are perhaps evils in inherited wealth, but there are perhaps even greater evils in the alternatives.

Dr. Marek: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not accept that there are perhaps evils in inherited wealth. I hope that he certainly accepts that there are evils in inherited wealth. One only has to consider the events surrounding the French revolution in 1789 to recognise that fact.

Mr. Carrington: We are straying a long way from the clauses that are under discussion, but I hope that you will indulge me, Sir Paul, in a somewhat indulgent debate. The French revolution, as with so many other revolutions, started not with those who did not have wealth but with those who had very considerable wealth and privilege. They rebelled against the authoritarian power that other sections of society had over them, which they felt was unjust. What, in many ways, caused the French Revolution was inherited wealth being passed on among the bourgeoisie in France rather than an upsurge among those who had no money. I agree that great inherited wealth in France was attacked by lesser inherited wealth, but all of it was, nevertheless, inherited wealth. However, that was a different society and a different case.

8.45 pm

Inheritance tax needs to be put into perspective. The exemption level has been raised from £90,000 to £110,000. In absolute terms, that is a considerable sum of money, but I shall try to put it into perspective by considering what has happened in my constituency. It is now not unusual for a council flat at the top of a high-rise block to be valued for right-to-buy purposes at considerably in excess of £100,000.

People who exercise their right to own their own home, however modestly, in central London, elsewhere in the south-east and, as the economy develops, throughout the country, will now be exempted from inheritance tax. They will be able to pass on the benefit of their home, for which they have worked and struggled. Quite rightly, from society's point of view, it should be kept out of the tax net. By reducing inheritance tax to 40 per cent. it will be brought into line with the top rate of income tax. That, rightly, will simplify the taxation system.

What is the effect of penal taxation on inheritance? It makes it very difficult for people to pass on small businesses. They need time in which to grow within the compass of the family that started them so that wealth can be transferred from one manager to the next, perhaps across the generations. That is true of small manufacturing companies. It is even more true of the farming industry. I do not have many farms in my constituency, but I am reliably informed that the capital value of a farm will make it difficult, if inheritance tax bites hard, to pass it on.

The other aspect of inheritance tax that is bad for society is its effect on our artistic inheritance. One of its effects—though perhaps not on the great artistic treasures that are rescued by the state—relates to our minor artistic treasures: minor pictures and minor antiques. That heritage has been built up over the centuries. A very high rate of inheritance tax makes it very difficult to pass on those treasures to future generations. When a person dies, they are sold. The experience of the last 20 years has shown that the trade in antiques from this country in particular has been one way. They have been exported, with the result that minor works of art have been lost to us for ever overseas. One of the effects of inheritance tax has been to accelerate that trend.

The simplification of inheritance tax is greatly to be welcomed. It will enable families to pass on businesses, which they were unable to do before, and it will enable society to benefit from the wealth of one generation being passed on the the next.

Mr. Macdonald: I was grateful for the implication, if not the admission, by the Minister that the Conservative party is a charitable institution. We have often thought that to be the case, but the Minister's implication was interesting.

I think that you are quite right, Sir Paul, to indulge hon. Members. You are right to be liberal in your interpretation of how we may debate clause 128 and to allow us to refer to clause 127. The two clauses are linked. I am driven to that conclusion because, when I look at clause 127, I can find no justification for its inclusion in the Bill on the ground of economic efficiency or on the ground of social equity. I am driven to think that the reason for the inclusion of the clause is that it is linked to clause 128, in the sense that the governing party of this country gives money to the wealthy and hopes that the wealthy will end up giving money to the governing party. That is rather a blunt and crude conclusion, but I cannot find any other justification for clause 127.

I do not understand how the grounds of economic efficiency and incentives, which have been advanced about other cuts in taxation, notably income tax, can be stretched to justify the reduction in inheritance tax. I do not understand how the changes will act as incentives to those who are contemplating giving away estates to their children or to other recipients, particularly in view of the marginal nature of those changes. Those changes are not marginal when we consider the global sum given away, for example, through the cutting of the top rate of tax. According to the Government, that figure will be about £150 million. One would have thought that £150 million, plus the sum that will be lost through the raised ceiling, would be much better utilised in retraining unemployed workers than as a spurious attempt to confer a nebulous incentive upon the people who are thinking of giving away estates.

There is a difference between inheritance tax and income tax. Two or more parties are involved in inheritance tax—the person giving away the estate and the recipient of the estate. We must also take into account the disincentive effect on the recipients of estates. It is difficult to see how inherited wealth gives any incentive to the recipient to work harder. One would have thought that the contrary would be the case—that a substantial windfall gain through inheritance tax would be sufficient to kill any incentive to work.

Even if we concede that there is an incentive in reducing inheritance tax, surely it must be more than offset by the disincentive to the recipient. One wonders whether, if the Treasury had commissioned a study, the Government would have taken note of it, given what happened to the study on income tax and incentives.

We do not see any argument for the reduction of inheritance tax on the ground of incentives. The main basis on which to assess the changes in taxation is that of social equity. Within reasonable limits, it is right for individuals, when they die, to be able to leave some of the wealth that they have accumulated during their lifetime to their spouses and children. The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) said that that was, to some extent, what drives people on. They have an urge to accumulate a certain amount of money to pass on to their children. That is a reasonable and justifiable motive, but one cannot stretch the argument to say that people are driven in their working lives by the urge to make their children millionaires. People certainly work to give their children a secure foundation, but we cannot take the argument any further.

We all listened with interest to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). He argued against any form of inheritance, except within certain reasonable limits, and understood, from private conversations, that some Conservative Members also hold that view.

We are often told that the economic libertarian argument is the driving ideological force behind the Government. Philosophers of that persuasion believe that that is right, and they often say that their logic leads them to argue against any form of inheritance and that everybody should stand on their own two feet, independent of any social ties. If some of the economic libertarians on the Conservative Benches followed their beliefs to their logical conclusion, they would reach the same conclusion as my hon. Friend the Member for Workington.

That is not the Socialist point of view. As Socialists, we acknowledge family ties and duties, just as we acknowledge wider kinship to society as a whole. We believe that a balance must be struck. We consider the social effects of the accumulated wealth that has built up over successive generations. That is perhaps more deep-rooted in the United Kingdom than in other Western societies. An excessive accumulation has a serious social impact and is unhealthy for society as a whole. It cuts off economic opportunities.

We cannot say that there is anything approaching equality of opportunity when people start their working lives from such different bases. Those who begin with much more material advantage are bound to start the race ahead of the rest. When that process is repeated generation after generation, a certain rigidity is built into society, and we have the rise of a nebulous entity—some form of social establishment. That is unhealthy for society. Some Conservative Members go on about rigidities in the labour force, but they should look at the rigidities in the establishment through the accumulation of inherited wealth.

Another bad effect of inherited wealth is the link between wealth and power and influence over social and political decisions. The link between clauses 127 and 128 is a sterling example of the link between wealth and social and political influence. The figure of £100,000 is redolent of people who have observed the P and O strike recently. Access to such wealth conveys social and political influence.

Vast social inequalities are to a large extent undesirable in themselves. Perhaps that is not true in an ideal world where there is a surplus of all goods and no scarcity anywhere. If society were divided between billionaires and millionaires, the same objections would not arise. Today, however, we have a society of scarcity, of less, and of abundance. Millions of people appear to have been thrown on the scrap heap and the Government make only token efforts to retrain, reskill and re-educate them so that they may have genuine opportunities. Only then could the Government claim that they really want equality of opportunity.

I am struck by the contrast between those who have been thrown on the scrap heap and those who will benefit from the Budget. I think of the reduction in inheritance tax and the impact of housing benefit changes on old people. How can it be right for the Government to give away millions of pounds to the already wealthy through these changes in inheritance tax and embark on changes to housing benefit which take away from old people all but £3,000 of savings? If the wealthy have a right to pass on their savings to their children, do not these old people have a right to pass on some savings to their children? What savings will they be left with after the housing benefit changes? Only enough to pay for their own funerals.

The contrast here is between handouts to the rich and the Government taking away from the really needy. The top 1 per cent. own one quarter of all private wealth, and the bottom half share just 4 per cent. of all private wealth. The Budget merely polarises existing inequalities. It deepens existing injustices and it deepens already unhealthy trends in society. Most of all, it confirms the image of the Budget and of the Government as callous, uncaring and deeply unfair.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The Committee must be grateful to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) because he raised in the debate on this clause also, which is not in fact the clause which is officially the subject of this debate, several philosophical and economic issues of wide and fundamental importance which must underlie any discussion of inheritance tax.

The hon. Gentleman started with the declaration of a private interest, and I ought perhaps to do the same. Unlike him, I am not able to renounce any substantial inheritance. If my parents were to predecease me—I hope that if that happens the event is as long delayed as possible—I would not stand to inherit any substantial wealth.

I am sure hon. Members will agree that we should be discussing not the chance fortunes of individuals but the basis of the collective good, of general advantage. In his analysis of that, the hon. Member for Workington based his argument on a fundamentally false premise, which was that people essentially work for themselves and not for future generations. My proposition is that, while people work for themselves, they work also for the new generation—for their own children and grandchildren.

I was particularly surprised that the hon. Member for Workington made that mistake, because he declared himself an expert on the subject of small businesses. I should have thought that anybody who knew about small businesses would have encountered a striking phenomenon about them. It is the frequent if not universal desire of people who set up small businesses to see their own children take them on and the hope that those businesses will provide a livelihood for their children and their children's children. They are hopeful of creating an institution that will outlast them and that will be of lasting benefit to future members of their families.

Let us suppose that I am wrong and that the hon. Member for Workington is right. What would happen if people worked only for themselves? The answer is that on a net lifetime basis no one would invest. I say "on a net lifetime basis" because it is conceivable, on the hon. Member's hypothesis, that some people might at an early stage in their lives invest—but that would only be to disinvest later in their lives. Some people—because one can never predict the date of one's death—might under-shoot and some might over-shoot. But in aggregate everything produced would be consumed in the course of the person's lifetime.

Mr. Morgan: Will the hon. Gentleman consider also the example of immediate post-war Japan? One anecdote told about it is symbolic of those who reconstructed Japan. It concerns the founder of the Honda motor cycle company, who was asked in the early 1950s, when Honda was already showing astonishing signs of growth and international competitiveness, why he was adopting such an extraordinarily highly geared financial approach—not highly geared in the sense of his motor cycles—to his company's expansion. It was far more than was sensible in relation to his equity stake in the business, given that any slight downturn would make the business collapse immediately. He replied that that might be so, but the assets he had created would be taken on by somebody else, and that would be all to the good of Japan. It is alleged that many Japanese business men followed exactly the same philosophy in setting Japan on the road to the great economic success that it now enjoys.

Mr. Davies: One of the remarkable things about Japan is its very high savings rate. I have always associated that with the strong sense of family and family continuity. Anybody who knows Japan—I know it a little, albeit not profoundly, and I admire it greatly—knows that the fundamental backbone of Japanese industry is still the family company and the desire to found a company that one's children and grandchildren can take on. That is the phenomenon about which I was speaking earlier, and it is a universal human trend. It is pronounced in Japan and has had particularly happy economic consequences for that country.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the country which currently tops the OECD league for revenue coming into the exchequer from wealth transfer taxes is Japan?

Mr. Davies: That may well be so, but the Government are tapping a particularly strong source of revenue, for reasons that I have already illustrated.

The Committee cannot deny the logic of my proposition, which is that if people worked only for themselves there would be no net investment on a lifetime basis, and they would accumulate at the beginning of their lives only to consume what they had produced before their lives came to an end. On that hypothesis, which is based on the view of human psychology that I have already attributed to the hon. Member for Workington—he has now returned to the Chamber; I am sorry that he did not hear the compliment that I paid him earlier—there would be no increase in human wealth or incomes, no progress, no civilisation.

What would happen if, in a misguided moment, the House of Commons were to take fiscal or legislative action—I sense that a number of Opposition Members would like us to do so—that would effectively prevent individuals from passing on to their children or grandchildren the wealth that they had accumulated? Such legislative and fiscal action would produce exactly the same results as if the views of the hon. Member for Workington on human psychology were correct. No one would look forward to passing on anything. Everyone would have every incentive to consume what he had produced in his lifetime. The same black consequences for our economy and for civilisation would flow from such action.

Mr. Carrington: I have listened with fascination to my hon. Friend's argument, but he has not addressed himself to one of the fundamental points about small businesses. The enthusiasm of someone who sets up such a business —the desire to pass it on and to make it grow as large as possible—is not only of benefit to the inheritors of the wealth, but also of direct benefit to the employees, and therefore to society as a whole.

Mr. Davies: I disagree with nothing that my hon. Friend has said; I think that human psychology is a great deal more complex than the hon. Member for Workington wished us to believe. I think that human beings are to some extent selfish and to some extent selfless, and that the ambit of that selfishness, or that selflessness, extends to their children, their grandchildren and their employees. Some people are selfish; some people think of the next generation. But my point is that there is in human motivation a substantial element of concern with one's family and one's heirs. Human society could not, except at its peril, deprive itself of the tremendous motive power —the tremendous incentive to work and be enterprising —with which that substantial strain in human psychology has provided us.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): Is the hon. Gentleman giving way? I am not quite sure.

Mr. Davies: I thought that I had sat down, Sir Paul, but I do not wish to deprive the hon. Member for Workington of an opportunity to address the Committee again. I am happy to remain, as it were, notionally on my feet, while he makes the intervention that he wishes to make.

The First Deputy Chairman: We will assume that the hon. Gentleman is notionally on his feet.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I do not wish to intervene.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I detected a shift in the emphasis of the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) following the intervention by the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington). Until then, the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding had been saying that someone worked for himself or for his children. If he did the former, there would be no net lifetime investment; therefore, only inheritance made it possible for such an investment to take place. His hon. Friend reminded him that there are other social obligations that people seek to fulfil and other contributions that can be made to society at large, of which one's children or descendants will be part.

9.15 pm

Mr. Quentin Davies: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was listening to the early part of my remarks. I emphasised throughout my speech, and do so again, that human psychology is complex and that there are many factors involved in it. I intervened in order to redress the balance that I believed had been upset by the remarks of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). Of course I would not deny that many people work entirely for themselves. My point was to try to bring home to the Committee, in its consideration of inheritance tax, the important part that is played by people's desire to benefit their descendants.

Mr. Smith: I understood the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) to imply not that people simply work for themselves but that they work in order to benefit both themselves and society at large and that their children would benefit more as a result of not inheriting the wealth that had been accumulated. Of course, they would benefit in the general sense through the contribution that that would make to society as a whole, and if society carried on according to those principles, it would be a healthier society for everyone.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I quote again the example of my family and the experience there? It is my view that the good that will be done with the money that within my family will be expended on education in south Wales will be far more than would ever be the case if it were given to me or to anyone else in my family who would stand to inherit. My family will be richer in every sense as a result of the decision that has now been taken as against handing the money on to me.

Mr. Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend, and that makes a compelling case for progressive inheritance taxation. The clause takes us further away from that. The important characteristics of the clauses are that they make taxation less progressive and give rise to an even greater concentration of wealth and income in the hands of the few. The Government have deliberately failed to tackle the many loopholes and devices by which inheritance taxation and its predecessors have become so much more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman has totally misunderstood the essential point. The point is not what the hon. Member for Workington chooses to do with his inheritance, because, with respect, he did not create the wealth about which we are talking. His parents created the wealth. Therefore, the important point is their reason for having created that wealth. They created that wealth in the expectation of the hon. Member for Workington receiving part of it. Their expectations might have been disappointed or they might have been delighted to hand over the wealth to whatever good charitable cause the hon. Member for Workington designated. However, one cannot with impunity deprive the human race of the essential element in the economic incentive, which is to work in order to hand money to the next generation.

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening, he would have realised that I was advocating progressive inheritance taxation. He would not have heard me advocate total confiscation from one generation to another, and neither did my hon. Friend the Member for Workington. He said that there should be a reasonable threshold, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald).

The changes that we are debating merely compound the effect of the income tax changes and so much else that we have seen in the Budget. The hon. Member for Fulham made a not unreasonable point when he said that he saw merit in relating the taxation rates on inheritance to income taxation rates. However, with the banding being abolished in the case of inheritance tax, we are faced with precisely the same problem as that facing us on income tax.

The differential between the higher and lower rates has been narrowed and the progressive element of the taxation system is being squeezed out almost entirely from inheritance tax. That approach takes society away from the principle that Conservative and Labour Members have shown they support over the years—namely, that the wealthiest who own most should make a progressively greater contribution to the common good through taxation.

The retreat from that principle characterises the Budget more than anything else. It is a further confirmation that the Budget is for the rich at the expense of everyone else. Of course, it is very much at the expense of everyone else because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) pointed out in his opening contribution, the general burden of taxation in society, including taxes on expenditure, is increasing under this Government when taxation on capital gains and transfers and inheritance tax is decreasing. The ability of the very wealthy to pass on wealth to their descendants is being paid for by the rest of us in the form of taxes on income and expenditure. In evaluating the taxation system as a whole, one has to consider what can be achieved by cuts in expenditure taxation, cuts in income taxation, or increases in public expenditure, and applying the money to those in social need. In that way inherited wealth can be taxed effectively.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): What the hon. Gentleman says assumes that the productive part of the economy remains static and therefore that the incentives of reduced taxation do not work. Surely more money is made as a result of reduced taxation and is therefore positive in society.

Mr. Smith: I am pleased that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Martin) asks about incentives. Much of this debate has been precisely about the ability to inherit as a disincentive rather than an incentive to work. Indeed, the receipt of large amounts of unearned wealth is a powerful disincentive to many rich people.

According to market economics, which the Government and Conservative Members profess to follow, this is a great misallocation of resources, as there is no reason to suppose that the sons and daughters of the very rich will somehow be the most efficient custodians of, or reach the best decisions about, the way in which that wealth should be allocated and applied.

I have heard no evidence, certainly not during this debate, which I have sat through, to substantiate arguments from Conservative Members that higher or progressive inheritance rates would be a great disincentive to small business people. I have heard that point being made, but I have not heard any hard evidence of a correlation between the rates of taxation imposed and the amount of enterprise, the rate of formation of small businesses, or their success. There are no facts to substantiate the points made by hon. Gentlemen.

My second argument in rejecting the change proposed in clause 127 is that it deepens the already profound inequalities in our society and the polarised distribution of income and wealth. As my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles has pointed out, that distribution of wealth carries with it power and influence, which those with inherited wealth who exercise it have done nothing to earn or merit. This approach does not create the property-owning democracy that the Tories like to boast about to the people of this country, but further concentrates wealth and power in the hands of very few people. That entrenches ever more deeply the divisive and damaging class system.

When set against the deepening poverty of many in our society, the measure is nothing short of obscene. One cannot but be struck by the contrast between the treatment of the very rich in raising the threshold above which inheritance tax will be applied from £90,000 to £110,000 —reducing by a quarter the number of estates to which the tax will apply and the treatment of pensioners who lose housing benefit as soon as they have capital of more than £8,000.

These changes are as significant for what they do not do as for what they do. They do nothing to tackle the wide-scale avoidance of inheritance tax. The Price Waterhouse booklet, from which my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham quoted, showed that people already have the opportunity to avoid these taxes if they are well advised and do not suffer an early death. These changes do nothing to tackle the exemptions on gifts and the trusts and companies which have been created to take advantage of the further exemptions and concessions which are already available. They do nothing to tackle the many other devices by which people circumvent and minimise their tax liability. These changes ensure that the wealthy do not pay their fair share of taxation. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham referred to the diminishing share of the total tax take that is comprised in inheritance tax.

There is no justification for these concessions. The Chancellor boasted in his Budget speech that there would effectively be a 20 per cent. tax rate for businesses, which would be the lowest in the world. My hon. Friends have pointed out that much more successful and dynamic economies than ours have higher rates of taxation on inherited wealth. I do not accept the Chancellor's boast of Britain having the lowest tax rates in the world as reflecting any achievement by the Government. Rather, it is an indictment of a Government who, through their Budget and every other policy that they implement, put the interests of the very rich ahead of those of the rest of the country, at the cost of the poorest.

The Tory party glories in inequality of wealth. Just as the rest of the Budget makes Britain a more unfair society, plunging many people deeper into poverty and making the very rich even richer at the expense of the rest of us, so this inheritance tax proposal entrenches those divisions and passes them on from one generation to another. Paradoxically, this proposal will bequeath a poor legacy to our children.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Before I became a Member, I envied the great skills of the late Iain Macleod. I felt that his judgment of one nation was the right formula on which to work. I was a working-class lad from a humble background and I felt that the party that represented the nation without that terrible class hatred was the Conservative party, so I wanted to become a Conservative.

[Mr. Geoffrey Dickens]

I have listened with great interest to many of the Opposition's contributions. The words "wealth" and "inheritance" have been used as though they were dirty words. This country needs the great risk-takers, entrepreneurs, inventors and job-providers. They are the people who make the country tick. They create the wealth so that people can enjoy the benefits that are distributed. It is the Conservative party that seems to be distributing these things more fairly and targeting the help where it is needed most.

9.30 pm

One of the greatest motivations for successful people in this country is the thought that they may have something to leave their children, and that is a very commendable vision. I hope that one day I shall have something to leave my children, but it will be through hard work; it will not be through sitting back and following the politics of fear and envy——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Do not be silly.

Mr. Dickens: It is not being silly; it is being absolutely realistic. This needs to be said. Those who create the wealth are the people who create the jobs. If they create jobs, there is more work for everybody and more wealth for their families. The bigger the cake, the bigger the slices to be picked up from that cake, making the country a better place in which to live and work. Why should these people not have something to leave to their children, without savage taxation?

Is it not the Conservative party that has looked after the people on the workshop floor, given them the chance to own shares in the company in which they work? Is it not the Conservative party that has helped council tenants to own their own homes? Is it not the Conservative party that wants children to be able to ascend the ladder of excellence and attain education beyond the means of their parents through scholarships? Those are the sorts of things that the Labour party ought to be doing for the disadvantaged. We are now doing them, and that is precisely why the nation keeps returning Conservative Governments—because we represent all classes of people.

I do not want to be too mischievous, but it is absolutely right for people to create wealth and jobs. It is right that they should be able to leave something to their children without suffering savage taxation. The wealthy will always pay the lion's share, whether it is the community charge, direct taxation or anything else. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen laugh, but I must remind them that 50 per cent. of the community charge comes from the taxpayers, and the highest taxpayers are the wealthy. And 25 per cent. of the community charge comes from industries, which are also taxpayers. It is they who are creating wealth and jobs.

All this nonsense from the Opposition, using the word "wealth" as a dirty word, is absolutely disgraceful and they do themselves no favours whatsoever.

This clause is most important. It gives people that added motivation, when they believe that perhaps by their hard work, their labours and their toil, they can leave something to their children that will not be savagely taxed by the Treasury.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Clause 127 highlights the common theme of Conservative Budgets over the past nine years—nine years that have seen the burden of taxation increased for the average citizens of the country to give them an incentive to work harder, while during the same period the rich and the super-rich have had their taxes reduced to give them the same so-called incentive. Taxes on gifts and death duties have been lowered in successive Budgets to reward the wealthy and the well-heeled. Tax thresholds have been raised, tax rates have been lowered, aggregation periods have been reduced and the richest individuals have been enabled by the Conservatives to hand over large sums of money to others and to pay no tax at all if the gout does not claim them within seven years.

With clause 127 inheritance tax has been fixed at a single rate of 40 per cent. while the threshold has been raised by £20,000. The striking feature of clause 127 is the benefit that it confers on the really wealthy. A millionaire claiming no special reliefs or exemptions can, as a result of that clause, confer gains on his or her heirs of £145,000 at a stroke, enough to pay 5,000 mothers child benefit for a year at the index-linked level.

The £2 million estate benefits to the tune of £345,000, sufficient to raise the pensions of 900 senior citizens in line with pay and not the lower level that the Government have set. It is hardly surprising that those with modest estates of under £200,000 gain very little from that clause. I suppose that, in the light of the philosophy that is being propounded tonight by Conservative Members, people with estates of £200,000 deserve so little help because they have been so relatively unsuccessful in comparison with the achievements of aristo-rich.

Help has been lavished on the super-rich by the Government, but a very different attitude is shown by them to those on low incomes. The relatives of the rich are being encouraged to even greater dependency on the fruits of labours to which they have made no contribution, while those on social security or housing benefit are having their incomes forcibly reduced by the Government and, according to the Secretary of State for Social Services and the Government, their so-called dependency on the state reduced at the same time.

We have here a paradox where the Government are seeking to support the rich and the super-rich by making sure that relatives who have contributed so little gain so much from efforts towards which they have contributed nothing and in which they have made no investment, while others, many of whom have worked for the majority of their adult lives, receive from the Government not more but less. They have seen their pensions and their entitlement to benefits to which they have contributed reduced.

That is the nub of the clause and indeed, of the Budget. It is particularly important that we should reject clauses 127 and 128 because they are announcing a philosophy which is alien to the people of Britain. It is a philosophy that says that those people who have built up or inherited wealth, by whatever means, should be entitled to retain it. That is a philosophy that is not endorsed by many countries.

As the Financial Times has revealed, and as my hon. Friends have said and as has been conceded by Conservative Members this evening, the top of the OECD league in ensuring that wealth is taxed is one of the most successful economies—Japan. In Germany more is done to tax inherited wealth than in Britain. Those countries are doing more than ever to ensure that wealth is not passed on from generation to generation, but is ploughed back into wealth—creating enterprises, ensuring that fresh blood has the chance to use the money. But the Government are seeking to ensure that it is passed on in a moribund fashion—a fashion that died out many years ago. It is the corpse of a policy that has been resurrected and it will reap a bitter fruit for the Government, and an even more bitter one for the country.

Mr. Chris Smith: We have had a most interesting debate on clause 128, and the allied issues that lie at the heart of clause 127. Our deliberations have been given that added intellectual edge and zest by the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens).

First let me deal specifically and briefly with the matters enshrined in clause 128. Is is sad that the Paymaster General is not here to contribute to the discussion, because in another incarnation he has an interest in the provisions of clause 128. It should not take a genius to work out which political party is likely to benefit most from the clause. Because it is the Conservative party, we shall certainly divide the Committee.

Mr. Beith: In a spirit of genuine inquiry, may I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he believes that the principle of the exemption with which clause 128 deals, and which was put in place by a Labour Government, should be retained? What is his argument for not correcting what the Government regard as an anomaly?

Mr. Smith: The anomaly is that political parties are treated differently from charities. While I accept some of the arguments which the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made about the value of political work, and especially the voluntary work which goes into political activity, I do not believe that political parties should be equated exactly with charities. That is why we think that the distinction should remain.

The matters in clause 127 have formed the principal subject of the debate on clause 128. It is worth noting that the provisions of clause 127 increase the threshold for the application of inheritance tax by six times the amount required by indexation. The accumulation of all rates at 40 per cent., while putting some people at a marginally higher rate, will mean that most people will pay radically less. May I point out to the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth that that happens against a background where the top 1 per cent. still earn one quarter of all private wealth and the bottom half share between them just 4 per cent. of all private wealth?

Mr. Dickens: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to inform the House which of those two sections provides the jobs.

Mr. Smith: I could certainly tell the hon. Gentleman which of those two proportions provides the talent, the effort, the work and the labour which goes into making goods and producing the wealth of the country. The hon. Gentleman said that wealth is regarded by the Opposition as a dirty word. No, it is not. It is the misdirection of wealth which is regarded by us as reprehensible, and the distinction which I have just outlined represents a maldistribution.

The cutting of the top rate of inheritance tax to 40 per cent. will give those who are already wealthy an even greater boost. Only 5,200 taxpayers—fewer than one in 5,000—paid inheritance tax at rates above 40 per cent. last year on estates with an average value of £475,000. Assuming that a similar number would have paid the top rates of inheritance tax in the current financial year, the average gain from the cut in inheritance tax will be nearly £29,000. That is a direct gift from the Budget to those who are already wealthy.

For confirmation of that I turned to that well-known Socialist periodical, the Financial Times. In its analysis of the Budget of 16 March the Financial Times said:

> "The outstanding feature of the Chancellor's proposals is the benefit it gives the really wealthy. A millionaire, claiming no special reliefs or exemptions, gains—or rather his or her heirs gain—£145,000 at a stroke. The £2 million estate benefits to the extent of £345,000."

The newspaper also drew attention to the benefits that the Conservative Government had given over the past eight years to people passing on gifts. It said that just about every Budget

> "has seen some easing of the burden of death and gift taxes: raised thresholds; lower rates; reduced aggregation periods; gifts between individuals totally relieved of tax if they survive seven years; finally, this change to a single rate of tax of 40 per cent."

The evidence is clear that the real beneficiaries of clause 127 will be the extremely wealthy.

9.45 pm

The people who benefit will already be taking advantage of a wide range of mechanisms, especially the establishment of a variety of trusts that provide the possibility of planning to avoid inheritance tax. It is ineresting to note that tax avoidance experts say of this provision in the Budget that people should not simply take the gift that the Chancellor is giving them because it may be removed by a change of Government. I can happily assure them that they are correct in that assumption.

The basic principle of inheritance tax has been an interesting part of the debate. It was first mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) in an interesting and provocative speech.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): My hon. Friend might be interested to know that our hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) is more fastidious and rigorous than God himself in his beliefs on inheritance. Leviticus chapter 25—I hope that Conservative Members will look it up at the end of the day —recommends that wealth should be inherited for seven generations, but at the seventh the family should be divested of it all and start again.

Mr. Smith: I commend my hon. Friend on his learning. It is interesting that my hon. Friend the Member for Workington is more severe than the Old Testament in this respect.

I liked the formulation of my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) better. He said that we must acknowledge the ties of kinship and of family but strike the right balance. He thought that the Government proposals had not struck the right balance.

Mr. Morgan: Does my hon. Friend agree that the philosophical cleavage between the silver spoonists on the Conservative side who believe in inheritance, and us, who believe that genuine competitive entrepreneurism can start only from a level playing field can best be summarised by saying that we are the real followers of Alderman Roberts of Grantham and believe that necessity is the mother of invention; they believe that necessity is the invention of mother.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right as usual. The Government and Conservative Members have made much in the debate of their proposals for income tax changes and of the incentive effect of being able to keep more of the wealth that one earns. There may conceivably be some justification in some of the principles that underlie those comments about this so-called enterprise culture. There can be no such justification for saying that someone who benefits from the fruits of his or her efforts should be able to pass that on to members of a subsequent generation who have not, by their efforts, contributed to the making of that wealth. The balance that the Government have been attempting to strike in clause 127 cannot be justified.

The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) constructed an intellectual gem when he said that human beings are at times selfish and at time selfless. As an observer of human nature, I feel that that must be accurate. The Conservative Government have, over the past few months, forgotten the selfless side of human nature. The Budget has spoken entirely to the selfish. The top rate tax reductions were bad enough. These adjustments in inheritance tax rates are even worse. In asking my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against clause 128, I presume that we are, by so doing, clearly demonstrating our fervent opposition to clause 127.

Mr. Lilley: I apologise to the Opposition if they lost the opportunity to vote on clause 127 as a result of my natural, although unexpected, reticence and the procedural uncertainties.

Benjamin Franklin said:

"nothing can be said to be certain, except death and taxes."

Death has always held a peculiar attraction for the tax man, I suppose because the dead are the one group of taxpayers who cannot complain. The desire to bequeath an inheritance to one's heirs is one of the most powerful ambitions that motivate people. It is the objective that drives men to build up businesses, accumulate capital, build and improve houses and even to invest, as my hon. Friends the Members for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) and for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) have said so eloquently.

It is foolish to blunt such a potentially creative force by punitive inheritance taxes. If people know that the majority of their lifetime's effort will go not to their chosen heirs or causes but to the state, many will be discouraged from even starting on the path of enterprise. Others will sell out prematurely and enjoy the fortune themselves or devote themselves to the time-consuming process of tax avoidance. Even those who are insensitive to the prospect of inheritance tax may realise that their businesses will die with them when the executors are obliged to break into its assets to pay punitive death duties.

Those are the reasons why we have sought to ease punitive death taxes in this Budget. We have taken two further steps this year. First, we have substantially raised the threshold at which the tax is paid. Simple indexation would have required lifting the threshold from £90,000 to £94,000. Instead, we raised it by 22 per cent. to £110,000. This will take a quarter of all estates out of tax entirely. This follows a 27 per cent. increase in the threshold last year, so I remind my hon. Friends that in two years we have increased the threshold by 56 per cent.—substantially ahead even of the increase in house prices. Hon. Members who object to that presumably wish to bring more and more estates into taxation.

Secondly, we have scrapped the previous four rates of tax, ranging from 30 per cent. to 60 per cent., and replaced them with a simple flat rate of 40 per cent. The effect of that, plus the rise in the threshold, will be to reduce the burden of taxation on all estates. Since 1979 we have reduced the top rate of tax from 75 per cent. to 40 per cent., and simplified the structure by moving from no fewer than 14 different rates to just one.

Mr. Morgan: Is the Minister claiming that now that people have much less incentive to engage in tax evasion the number of accountants in this country will decline sharply as there is no longer need for them?

Mr. Lilley: Last week I spoke at the Institute of Taxation, and received a rather frosty reception from the president on account of the Chancellor's remark that that was the one profession that we hoped did badly out of the Budget. Of course, we believe that such professionals will find interesting and valuable uses for their talents elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) quoted from the speech that I made to the Institute of Taxation, and mentioned my remarks about Father Navarette and his wise words on the disincentive effect of punitive taxation on income. The hon. Gentleman imagined that the reductions in taxation and the loopholes that had been left would mean that we would not succeed in getting much income from inheritance tax, and that the changes that we have made would reduce revenue.

It is worth noting that since we have cut the top rate of taxation from 75 per cent. to 60 per cent., as well as raising thresholds so that 96 per cent. of all estates are free from duty altogether, the revenue from the duty on estates has risen by about one half in real terms. When I first discovered that, I asked my officials whether we had created an incentive for people to die early. Hon. Members will be pleased to know that that probably is not the case. The buoyant yield of inheritance tax reflects the rise in asset values, the growing prosperity of the country, the increase in the number of businesses and, of course, the delayed effect of spouse exemption—in other words, the estates which were relieved from taxation when they were passed on to a spouse are now coming into taxation when the surviving spouse, usually the widow, passes on.

Although, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) implied, many people went to considerable lengths to avoid paying inheritance tax, the incentive to do so certainly has been reduced, and is further reduced in the Budget. With a growing economy and an enterprise culture, we are confident that the base of inheritance tax will be buoyant in future. We welcome, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) in his valuable speech, the fact that nearly two thirds of people own their own homes. Consequently more people are able to leave their homes to their children. As more people acquire shares, they will have investments to bequeath to their heirs. As more people build up businesses that nearly two thirds of people own their own homes. Consequently more people are able to leave their homes to their children. As more people acquire shares, they will have investments to bequeath to their heirs. As more people build up businesses, they will leave family firms.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), for whose integrity I have great respect and who is the sea-green incorruptible of the Labour party, made an interesting point. He intervened in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to say that, in his view, the very process of inheritance undermines the spirit of enterprise. He is the living proof to the contrary. The fact that he renounced the prospect of inheritance did not stop him setting up a successful small business, and I pay tribute to him.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman is an example to us all in this respect as in so many others, but he was not deflected from that path by the possibility of obtaining from his parents a substantial inheritance which he chose voluntarily to renounce. The hon. Gentleman asserted that we suffered relative to Japan in that Japan, in his view, had higher inheritance taxes. Until this year, if one left £500,000 to one's heirs in this country, one would have had to pay more tax than in Japan. Similarly, if one left £1 million in this country, more tax would have had to be paid than in Japan. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) referred to a person leaving £2 million. Until this year, one would have had to pay more tax on that amount than in Japan. Since the Budget, the position of those who leave £2 million is slightly better in this country than in Japan. However, I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman will maintain that Britain has benefited in the past from our high inheritance tax compared with Japan.

Small businesses that are passed on to heirs pay considerably less inheritance tax than is paid in Japan because of the special exemptions that we make. We are particularly concerned to ensure that the growth in prosperity of family businesses is not threatened by the burden of inheritance tax. The abolition in 1986 of capital transfer tax on lifetime giving enables family businesses to be passed on to the next generation tax-free.

Mr. Morgan: Is the Minister willing to accept that 99 per cent. of all independent commentators have attributed much of the superior economic growth performances of both Germany and Japan since the second world war, compared with this country, to the fact that to an extraordinary extent there has been continuity of wealth in this country, which has been associated with very slow economic growth? Japan and Germany had to start afresh in 1948. Much of their greater wealth has been created by first generation entrepreneurs.

Mr. Lilley: I do not know which economic commentators the hon. Gentleman employs, but he should employ new ones. Germany has the lowest inheritance tax of any of the countries that I have considered, if wealth is passed on to a close relative or to a child. This country has far fewer family businesses than Germany and Japan. We want to reverse that trend.

If tax is payable, the effective rate for a family business that enjoys 50 per cent. business property relief is less than 20 per cent. That is one of the lowest rates in any major Western economy. The desire to leave something to one's children and grandchildren, to friends and to causes that one supports is both natural and altruistic and a penal burden should not be imposed.

We do not believe in a one-generation society—each generation starting anew with nothing. Furthermore, it is not realistic. Each generation stands on the shoulders of its predecessors. As a society, we inherit the wealth, technology and infrastructure that have been created by previous generations. It is only reasonable that individuals should also have the right to pass on inherited wealth to their heirs as they choose.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to clause 128. I welcome his support for it and the support of his party in 1975 when the unfortunate anomaly was created. It is right and reasonable that we should recognise the right of individuals to pass money to political parties, if they so wish.

Several hon. Members have said that the only beneficiary of this change will be my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, wearing his other hat. When I was chairman of the Bow Group, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) was trying to introduce a wealth tax. I met my counterpart, the then chairman of the Fabian Society, now Lord Ponsonby, who told me that he had just been lobbying the right hon. Member for Leeds, East because he feared for the finances of the Fabian Society if it were unable to benefit from the inheritances that it received. He asked me to support him. I had to say that, as fas as I knew, the Bow Group had never received any inherited money and that it was not in that fortunate position.

This change stands to benefit all sides of the political spectrum, and I commend it to the House.

Clause 42

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 43, line 41, at end insert

'or the loan is made to a registered disabled person.'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this we may take amendment No. 11, in page 44, line 14, after 'April 88' insert

'or the loan is made to a registered disabled person.'.

Mr. Kirkwood: Clause 42 raises some wide-ranging and important issues. The amendments seek to focus the debate on a more finely defined issue—the disabled. Amendment No. 10 is fairly transparent in its purpose: it seeks to retain tax relief on home improvement loans for disabled people. The justification is simply that disabled people need to adapt their homes to meet the needs of their disabilities.

It goes without saying that the disabled are a particularly vulnerable section of our community. Opposition Members would argue that some of them have suffered especially severely at the hands of the present Government, particularly in relation to the recent social security changes. The old system of supplementary benefit, which brought in its train a system of regular additional payments and single payments as a legal requirement, allowed disabled people to underpin their income and to receive substantial support. The provisions brought in at the beginning of last month changed that system. As a result of the new regime of income support, the severely disabled in particular have suffered considerable financial loss.

My amendment refers directly to registered disabled persons, although I should like to talk about a slightly wider group. The term "registered disabled person" does not embrace the needs of the elderly or, necessarily, those of the mentally handicapped or mentally ill. A large group of people could benefit from the amendment if it were accepted. There are, however, problems of definition in making it clear to whom we are trying to give the concession. The simplest option is probably to restrict debate to the words of the amendment, which embrace only registered disabled persons. The wording has a statutory meaning which leaves no doubt about who would qualify for exemption.

I do not think that the Government can base an argument on the costs that the amendment would involve. The tax forgone by the Treasury would be restricted, because a limited number of people would qualify, and only a relatively small proportion of that group would consider physical adaptations to their homes of benefit to them as individuals.

The cost of the amendment would be modest, but I submit that the effect of obtaining the relief—the ability to undertake such improvements—could transform the quality of life for those taking advantage of the measure. In my experience, few disabled people living outside custom-built institutionalised premises could not benefit from some physical alteration to their homes. There is a case for a coherent Government policy on disabled people to be applied across various Departments. It is only recently that we have begun to appreciate how the quality of life for people with disabilities can be transformed by simple changes to their homes.

[MISS BETTY BOOTHROYD in the Chair.]

I have personal experience of taking part in a stunt organised by the Young Liberals at the Liberal assembly in 1986. It consisted of putting me in a wheelchair for the best part of a day and taking me through the process of staying in an hotel and taking part in the conference. That had a salutary effect on my perception of some of the problems faced by people in wheelchairs in their homes and their ordinary everyday lives.

There is a real need for the Government to adopt a coherent approach and to accept the need to change the perceptions of those of us who enjoy good health and a full life. We have a real fight on our hands and a campaign is needed to change people's attitudes. The Government have an important role to play in that. The change that I am suggesting in the amendment would, if it were accepted, play an important part in that coherent Government policy.

If the Government resist the amendment, they will be liable to the charge that their timing is to be deplored. I say that because the Committee will know that the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys expects to publish the results of a survey of disabled people in a series of reports to be issued later this year. That survey will establish the need and extent to which care and support are required. In the past, Government Departments have been labouring under the handicap of not knowing the true extent of the needs of disabled people. Later this year that will not be the case.

I believe that the information that the OPCS provides will serve to inform us about the extent to which ramps, wider doors, lifts and improved access for disabled people can help. It will show the extent to which extra rooms for carers added to homes, or to which bathrooms or single-storey accommodation can prevent institutionalisation. That is all in the area of constructive improvement and does not begin to embrace the improvements that can be brought about by electronic aids which can now be built into improvements in and adaptations to disabled people's homes.

There are other aspects of Government policy that already recognise the needs of the disabled. I draw the Committee's attention to the report on community care recently published by Sir Roy Griffiths. That recognises the need for social work departments to provide tailor-made support to enable people to continue to live at home. The report said:

"If community care means anything, it is that responsibility is placed as near to the individual and his or her carers as is possible."

If community care is to be a reality and more than just a slogan to which the Government pay lip service, the terms of the amendment should be accepted. Our suggestions can make a positive contribution.

There are other examples of the way in which the distinct nature of building work for disabled people can make a contribution. That has been recognised by Governments in a number of ways. For example, improvement grants have always been paid to the disabled at priority rates. Disabled people are allowed to have charges waived for planning and building control applications and perhaps most significantly, disabled people have always been eligible for zero rating for value added tax on building costs. Therefore, there are clear precedents. Deliberate and coherent concessions have been made to try to improve the special needs of disabled people.

My argument to the Committee in relation to these amendments is that the key difference for the disabled person when considering home improvements is that they are necessary. They are not a matter for exercising choice, which would be the case for able-bodied members of the community. The interest relief that I wish to sustain in the amendment is important to disabled people. To remove the relief would impose an unnecessary financial burden on the most vulnerable members of society.

10.30 pm

Mr. Butterfill: I have listened with great interest and some sympathy to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). Many of us would agree that the special needs of the disabled should be accommodated wherever possible. On the other hand, I have to say that there are many other groups that we could include in the special pleading made by the hon. Gentleman. No doubt some of us will turn to that later this evening.

What is incontrovertible, however, is that there has been a lot of abuse of loans for the purpose of home improvements. The hon. Gentleman's amendment would carry greater weight if it proposed not only that the exemption should be for disabled persons, but arising out of their special needs as disabled persons. There is otherwise a possibility of some abuse by disabled persons, as there is by other members of the community in the same way. For that reason, I feel unable to support the amendment.

Mr. Morgan: The answer to abuse is to correct the abuse by asking for invoices, so that a grant depends on the submission of audited invoices for the work done.

Mr. Chris Smith: On behalf of the official Opposition, I welcome the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) mentioned two objections to the amendment, the first being that many others might fall into a special need category. That is precisely why we shall be debating on clause stand part some of the wider issues surrounding the removal of relief from home improvement loans.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the problem of abuse. That point has been answered excellently by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) by saying that one tackles abuse by tackling specific abuses rather than removing the relief altogether.

Mr. Butterfill: With regard to what the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) have just said, the point could be even better tackled by an amendment providing that the relief would be directed not just to disabled persons, but to their special needs. That is my objection to the wording of the amendment.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman fails to pick up the point, which I shall deal with later in more detail, that when addressing abuse one addresses distinctly those areas where abuse is likely to occur. There is very little evidence that people with disabilities have been abusing the home improvement tax relief system. Indeed, that is one reason why I certainly wish to support the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire.

I support the amendment for three other reasons. First, the essential nature of the improvement work carried out by those with disabilities reflects their need for extra ramps, wider doors, lower working surfaces, and wider internal doorways in their dwellings. The sort of improvements that are carried out are essential for them to lead a proper and easy life. Secondly, many of them face a financial necessity in carrying out improvement work, which to a certain extent is eased by the prospect of tax relief being available. Thirdly, it is easy to check and monitor such a system. It is administratively easy because of the system of registration of disabled persons. The amendments would easily cope with that. The Government will be hard put to find cogent arguments against them. I hope that they will accept them.

Mr. Wigley: I apologise, Miss Boothroyd, for arriving late. I understand that earlier the timing went a little skew-whiff.

I very much support the amendment. Disabled people should have the maximum provision possible. I know, from my experience on the all-party disablement group and from constituency cases, the sort of help that can be made available and which makes a material difference. There is, for example, tax relief. It may not make a great difference to disabled people if they are not taxpayers and not in a position to get direct benefit from it, but it can make a difference to the large number of people whose incomes or benefits are taxed.

The situation of disabled people is difficult enough. We, as a family, know that the cost of disablement can be much higher than the estimates, especially when there is multiple disablement. Attendance allowance and other benefits—we welcome the new benefits—often do not go far enough towards meeting the costs of day-to-day living or leaving any money to spare, either to fund loans to undertake the work needed on a house or to accumulate capital to do that work directly.

It is clear that disabled people need to meet a greater expenditure than the average family.

Mr. Butterfill: Would it not be an anomaly, which the hon. Gentleman would find difficult to support, if the amendment were carried and a disabled person were permitted tax relief on an extension to provide an extra bathroom but a family with young children with an equal need for a bathroom were denied that same relief?

Mr. Wigley: One can argue in favour of relief for families with young children, especially when income support is not sufficient to provide the basic facilities needed for everyday life. There are families on income support who will not pay tax whereas often disabled people, because of the nature of their income, to pay tax. Their cost of living in meeting everyday requirements is that much higher than even the costs of meeting the burdens on people with young families. I can testify to that from personal experience, but many other people, who have had the same experiences as we have but have not had the resources to meet them, can testify even more strongly.

Mr. Morgan: There is a further financial reason for making tax relief available: the adaptations which are carried out on the homes of disabled people frequently cost a lot of money and reduce the property's capital value on the open market, because they are specific to the needs of the disabled.

Mr. Wigley: That is true in some circumstances. It can work both ways. If a bathroom is needed downstairs as well as one upstairs, that can be additional, but some changes make it difficult to sell a house. I can think of one instance in my constituency when that certainly happened.

It comes back to the question how we try to help disabled families to meet their additional costs in paying for their everyday requirements. One could certainly argue that there are other ways of doing it, but since those ways are not available at present and the benefits, the specialised housing availability and the grants through the social services departments are to a large extent not available to the majority of those who need them, one has to look at what is possible. This has been a possible avenue in the past for undertaking certain work. It has been more generally available, and if it is now to be less generally available I would argue that there is still a strong case for being able to help disabled people and that they should be the last group from which one withdraws this sort of assistance.

I therefore suggest to the Committee that in making this additional provision within the exceptions to paying full income tax and giving this additional relief one is doing something that has support across the Chamber, not only in this context but in others. I hope that, if the Government cannot give a commitment to look again at this matter—if they could, I would welcome it—the entire Committee will support the amendment.

Mr. Brooke: I understand the sentiments which have informed this brief debate. These amendments would continue relief for home improvement loans to registered disabled people irrespective of the improvements carried out and of whether they were connected with the borrower's disability—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill).

This would be very arbitrary in its impact. First, many people with disabilities or special needs of one sort or another are not registered. Secondly, most improvements are irrelevant to a person's disability and it would be odd to provide relief for a loan for double glazing for a disabled person but not for someone else. Thirdly, relief is given only to the borrower and this would do nothing to help a borrower who is not disabled but has a disabled person in his or her household.

An alternative approach would be to try to construct a less arbitrary relief which would be limited to deserved improvements for the disabled. That would be a very difficult allowance to try to administer. The tax system has to operate by reference to general rules and cannot easily distinguish between particular cases.

Mr. Chris Smith: The right hon. Gentleman seems to be in the midst of arguing that because we have a system that is good but ultimately imperfect we should remove it altogether, and that we cannot have a perfect system because that would be administratively too complex. He mentioned double glazing. Does he not recognise that there are many people who, because of their disability, need better heating than other people and that the energy conservation which might become available with double glazing could be of incalculable benefit to them?

Mr. Brooke: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument, but he is making my point for me. He is saying that there will be individual cases in which double glazing is relevant, although there may be a large number of cases in which it is not. It would be throwing on the administration in terms of the tax the decision whether double glazing was appropriate for that particular person.

The right approach here is through the grants which are available to adapt homes for disabled owners and occupants. As the consultation paper "Home Improvement Policy" makes clear, we intend that these grants should continue and be mandatory.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) referred to particular arrangements for VAT in a certain number of cases of disabled persons, but he implied that they were universal and applied to all such cases. That is not so; they are specifically tailored, and that underlines the point I was seeking to make.

I ask my hon. Friends to resist the amendment.

Mr. Kirkwood: That really is an unacceptable response, and fairly pathetic. The Minister is saying that it is all too complicated and difficult and would create too many bureaucratic anomalies. That is a disgraceful way to approach these things. Of course the other provisions that he referred to exist, but we are trying to get the Government to face up to the need for a coherent approach that addresses all these problems, some of which may well be complicated. Some may well be technically complicated, and of course some amendments are less than perfect. That is because we are all enthusiastic amateurs when it comes to parliamentary draftsmanship. We do not have the experience of parliamentary draftsmen.

[Mr. Kirkwood]

The Minister's response was disgraceful and the lobby groups outside the House will read his reply with great interest and condemn him in the way that he so richly deserves. I hope that hon. Members will join me in the Lobby tonight.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.—[Mr. Brooke.]

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): This clause chips away at the tax relief which has been available to home owners for a great many years. I welcome the Government's sensible refusal to index the £30,000 maximum for mortgage tax relief. It may have been right to encourage home ownership by fiscal incentive, but there is a case for allowing that distortion to fade away through inflation, which is what is happening.

I should be happy if the incentive were transferred to encourage movement from public to private sector provision for other things, particularly health. Tax relief for the medical insurance premiums of the over-60s would be one way of encouraging further growth in private sector health provision.

It is right to retain tax relief for existing borrowings for home improvement loans. The Committee will welcome that. To have done otherwise would have disrupted the finances of many households that had planned their affairs on the basis that they would get that tax relief. It seems that an existing borrower will lose relief if he repays his loan and refinances it with a new loan from a different lender. In effect, he will be locked into his existing lender. If that lender charges a relatively high rate of interest, the borrower will not be able to shop around the market for a cheaper rate because it is unlikely that the difference in rate will compensate him for the loss of that tax relief. The lender will have his borrower over a barrel.

The problem affects anyone with a mortgage, any part of which was to finance improvements. There are many such mortgages. It is encouraging that the mortgage market has become more competitive in recent years, and it would be a great pity if that competition were stifled by tax problems arising out of this clause. I understand that some mortgage lenders are getting as much as a third of their new business through transfers of existing loans from other lenders. Might it not be more equitable if tax relief could be continued when a borrower refinanced his mortgage with a new lender without losing tax relief?

There is also doubt about what happens if a lender wants to sell mortgages to another financial institution. This is an increasingly likely possibility as there are signs of a more active secondary market in mortgages developing here along lines similar to those in the United States. Again, it would be pity if this development were strangled at birth. I should like my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General to reassure the Committee that the borrower will not lose tax relief simply because his lender has sold on the mortgage to another party.

There are also two practical difficulties that I draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend. The first is where a mortgage was taken out some time ago, partly to buy a house and partly to improve it, and has since been partly repaid. How will the Inland Revenue decide what proportion of the remaining loan qualifies for tax relief if the loan is then sold or refinanced?

The second problem, which is rather more important, concerns the first-time buyer of modest means who will buy a property that needs, in the words of the estate agent, "some modification". In other words, it needs a lot of improvement. This means that young couples in particular can buy a first house without having to put down too much capital, and by a process of do-it-yourself can, over months or years, but at their own pace, improve the property and, all the way along the line, borrow money on the mortgage so that the improvements will qualify for tax relief. I know that many people do this, and I did it myself, and I know that hon. Members on both sides of the Committee will have experience of this situation.

Outside the south-east of England—for example, in my constituency—one can buy a property for £15,000, which is not possible in this part of the country. The capital cost of that acquisition would qualify for relief, but under the clause any improvement done by the young couple who had bought such a house over the next year or two would not qualify for relief, and they would lose that advantage. All sorts of schemes may be dreamt up to do something about this problem, but the chief beneficiaries will be the estate agents—some may say, "again".

I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider the practical difficulties that arise out of this clause, and that he will be able to give me the reassurances that I seek.

Mr. Chris Smith: I hope, as a result of the remarks that the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) has made, that he will be joining us in the Lobby to vote against clause 42. We have a number of basic objections to clause 42. First, it will deter the improvement of the nation's housing stock. Secondly, it will harm the construction industry. Thirdly, it will harm a substantial number of bona fide home owners.

The National Home Improvement Council, in its comments on the measure, has pointed out that this comes on the heels of a number of other Government measures that deter home improvement. It pointed out that the 15 per cent. VAT that is now added to all home improvement works, including repair and maintenance, but does not apply to new build work, is a deterrent to improvement. It also pointed out that the abolition of insulation grants, except for those receiving social security assistance, deters home improvement, as will the abolition of income tax relief on interest on home improvement loans. It went on:

"These measures taken together are hard to reconcile with the Government's stated intention of revitalising the older housing stock."

That puts it in a nutshell. The Government cannot on the one hand claim to be seeking to improve our older housing stock, and on the other hand seek to remove tax relief which is one of the mechanisms for bringing about that improvement.

Why are the Government bringing in this measure? Perhaps the answer lies in the Chancellor's Budget speech. When talking specifically about home improvement loans, he said:

"This may be partly due to the substantial scope for abuse, as loans ostensibly taken out for home improvements are used for other purposes, a matter which was the subject of a recent report from the Public Accounts Committee."—[Official Report, 15 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 1009.]

As far as I can tell from reading carefully what the Chancellor said in his Budget speech, and what has been said by Ministers subsequently, that seems to form the entire burden of their argument for removing tax relief from home improvement loans.

Let us consider the question of abuse, which does occur to some extent, and how best to tackle it. First, abuse can be much better controlled than it is at the moment by greater monitoring and checking that work has been carried out for the loan that has been received and which is the subject of relief. Indeed, that was the burden of the two amendments that I and my hon. Friends tabled, and that, in the interest of getting on to the wider clause stand part debate, I did not move. Surely it should stand as an automatic principle that if there is abuse, the entire relief should not be removed altogether from those who abuse and those who do not abuse. Instead, there should be more careful control of the use to which the loan is put. The Government should have taken that route. Sadly, they did not do so.

Secondly, as far as anyone can tell, abuse is at a relatively low level. Some three years ago, by means of a parliamentary question, I asked Government Ministers what was their assessment of the amount of abuse of tax-relieved home loans. At that time they could not provide an estimate. Now, suddenly, when we come to consider this measure, we get an estimate. The Inland Revenue's best estimate is that the level of abuse on home improvement loans for tax relief is around 20 per cent., of the loans that are taken out. Effectively, the Government, in seeking to tackle 20 per cent. are harming the other 80 per cent.

The Building Societies Association put it extremely well in the briefing document that it prepared in connection with our debate. It is worth quoting because it is apposite to what we are discussing and to the issue of abuse which was raised earlier by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and which seems to be at the heart of what the Government are seeking to do. The Building Societies Association says:

> "It seems unfortunate that the government is using abuse as a reason for denying something which was previously considered perfectly acceptable, and, also, that it has not allowed the measures which it had taken to deal with abuse to be seen to be working. It is rather like suggesting that because there is abuse of unemployment benefit, that unemployment benefit itself should be abolished, whereas in this particular area the government does prosecute."

I do not want to give ideas to the Government or some of their supporters, but even this Government can surely see that, even if there is abuse, it should not be tackled by removing the relief altogether.

Some of the items that count as being eligible for home improvement loans are regarded by the Government as luxuries or unworthy items. The item that is always quoted is double glazing. The Government always ignore the fact that double glazing can have beneficial energy conservation effects. It is sometimes needed in inner city constituencies—I speak with some feeling as I represent one of them—to make life tolerable for people by cutting down the level of noise. Far from being a luxury, double glazing may be a necessity.

Mr. Butterfill: If double glazing is necessary because of the amount of aircraft or traffic noise, it can be made available through public funding, but if it is considered to be necessary for insulation purposes it would be very much better to spend the money on insulating the cavity walls or on providing additional loft insulation.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman is partly right, but he is not right about the availability of public funding. I should like the residents of Canonbury road in my constituency, who include the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, to be able to secure public funds with which to double glaze their windows to keep out the traffic noise, but that is an impossibility. The hon. Gentleman ignores the fact that the Government could have said that they would draw up a check-list of items, some of which are acceptable while others are not, and that home loans would or would not qualify for tax relief by reference to the check list.

The Government's arguments about abuse and about the "luxury" nature of some of the improvements have no validity because easily administered and valid mechanisms are available to deal with both of those points. Sadly, the Government have chosen to include clause 42 in the Bill. Its effect will be detrimental in a number of ways. It will be detrimental especially to those who purchase homes that are in a substantial state of disrepair. That happens in many parts of the country, and especially to people who are on relatively low incomes, for whom that may be the only way to achieve home ownership status to which they aspire.

Why do the Government not accept the Building Societies Association's proposal, that if improvement work is carried out within 12 months of the purchase of the property it ought to qualify? The Government could easily accept such an amendment to assist the problem of those purchasing homes in a state of disrepair.

The Government ignore the fact that over 1 million dwellings in this country are unfit for habitation. Almost all of them are in the private sector and many are owned by elderly people who, without financial assistance, cannot afford to renovate them or carry out the necessary improvements to enable the homes to be brought up to the appropriate standard. The Government should have taken account of that and of the impact of the measure upon the condition of those properties.

The Government have not taken account of the problem of replacement or consolidation loans which are often taken out in a bona fide manner by owner-occupiers wishing to consolidate a number of different mortgages on the same property or to transfer their mortgage from one lending agency to another. Again, the Building Societies Association has proposed sensible measures to deal with that problem. I look forward to hearing from the Paymaster General that the Government are listening to those suggestions.

The Government have also done nothing to deal with the anomaly that will develop because the loan on an original purchase will qualify for mortgage tax relief, while the improvement work carried out subsequently will not qualify for tax relief, yet, upon a subsequent sale, the entire value of the improved property will qualify for full mortgage tax relief. Is it fair that the original purchaser should qualify for less mortgage tax relief than the subsequent purchaser? That anomaly will develop as a result of the Government's proposals and, so far as we can see, the Government are doing nothing to deal with that.

Finally, the Government ignore the fact that their proposal will encourage people to take out much larger mortgages than they need to fund a subsequent improvement that they fear may be needed to bring the property up to an appropriate standard.

The Government have ignored all those points in bringing forward this proposal. We must ask them to think again about the clause. It will harm home owners, will be to the detriment of the condition of our nation's housing stock and will play havoc with, and create anomalies in, the home loans market. I sincerely hope that the Government will go back to the drawing board, think again and, when they see abuse, will not take a sledgehammer to smash many good features.

[Mr. Smith]

Mr. Butterfill: I must declare two interests in respect of this clause because, whichever way the vote goes this evening, I may stand to gain from it. First, I am a director of two construction companies with an interest in the removal of the clause from the Bill. Secondly, I am a senior partner in a firm of chartered surveyors which is also involved in estate agency. As many people may be forced to move because they will not be allowed to extend their homes, my agency may well benefit from the clause.

We must address that dichotomy. I would be the first to agree that there have been many abuses of home improvement loans. There is no doubt that loans have been used to buy motor cars, holidays in Marbella and for other purposes for which they were not intended. However, it is possible to deal with those abuses in ways other than by abolishing the system of home improvement loans.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): In view of his declaration, would the hon. Gentleman like to comment on the view of Sir Jeffery Sterling about the striking seamen at P and O and moonlighting?

Mr. Butterfill: I do not think that that intervention is worthy of a reply. I shall return to the subject under debate. We are seriously debating whether there should be a system of home improvement loans and what justification there is for them.

In regard to rural properties, for example, it would not be possible in green belt areas to have permission granted for new properties, but it is desirable that existing properties should be improved and, in some cases, extended. In rundown inner-city areas, too, it is desirable to be able to improve the housing stock and to encourage owners to make improvements. For that reason, I hope that it will be possible to retain some relief for those people who wish to improve their properties.

I have received many representations on this matter from the chartered accountants in Scotland and in England, the Building Societies Association and many others. We know that the National Home Improvement Council is anxious that relief should be retained. The essence of the problem is, therefore, how to deal with the abuses and to tighten the criteria under which home improvement grants might be available.

There are some so-called improvements which are not strictly necessary. They could reasonably be excluded. There are others, however, that are entirely desirable and should be permitted. The chartered accountants in Scotland have suggested that there should be a system of inspection by surveyors and that certificates should be issued. Again, I declare an interest as a surveyor, but that proposal seems eminently sensible, especially if the prospective borrower is required to pay the costs that the Government might incur in making inspections and issuing certificates. If the borrower is to receive a benefit in the form of tax relief, he should pay the cost to the public of certifying that relief should be available. As such a scheme could be made available, I ask my right hon. Friend to think again about this matter.

Mr. Win Griffiths: We have here a most insidious and damaging clause which will have serious repercussions on the state of property, especially in Wales and other parts of the country where the industrial revolution had its first roots.

Wales has more housing stock which was built between 1870 and 1914 than any other part of the United Kingdom. Only this week, Arolwyg Cyflwr Tai Cymru—the Welsh house condition survey for 1986—was published. Although it shows a slight improvement in the condition of the Welsh housing stock, it reveals that there are still 72,000 houses which it considers unfit. Of those, 40,000 lack basic amenities of some sort, ranging from no inside toilet or bathroom to no hot water or kitchen sink. Some 55,000 terrace houses in Wales need repairs costing more than £3,000. That applies to 23,800 semi-detached houses and 29,300 detached houses. Fortunately, it applies to only 3,700 flats. There is a need to invest more money in improving the housing stock of Wales.

Mr. Wigley: As part of my own constituency—the Dwyfor area—is cited as the worst district included in that survey, will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the worst districts are also those which have the longest waiting lists for grants, stretching back before 1984? People there cannot rely only on grants to improve the condition of their properties. They must look to capital from other directions to do that, which is why these provisions are so important.

Mr. Griffiths: I confirm what the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) says and would add that it is a problem not just in the areas of worst deprivation but right across Wales. Last year, my own district of Ogwr, for example, granted about 800 home improvement grants. The council considers that almost all of the applicants obtained a top-up loan in addition to the grant in the form of an extension to their mortgages, so that the work could be carried our properly. Because home improvement grants are now usually a maximum of 50 per cent. it is necessary for people to obtain an additional loan—yet clause 42 would end tax relief for people obtaining such loans.

The properties concerned are usually of fairly low value and are subject to mortgages nowhere near the £30,000 limit on which tax relief can be enjoyed. They are the property of people who would be worthy of, and could justify receiving, the relief that will now be ended. In the south-east of England, where property prices are much higher, there is no problem about an individual using up the whole of the tax relief to which he is eligible.

Mr. Morgan: Perhaps my hon. Friend and I can educate Conservative Members in respect of the value of typical properties in the valleys or in a south Wales city. There, an unimproved house would be worth perhaps £11,000 or £12,000,and might achieve a value of £20,000 to £23,000 once it had been improved. Even after improvement, those properties would still not utilise the full tax relief that properties in the south of England automatically enjoy.

Mr. Griffiths: Rather than dispense with the scheme altogether, the Government ought to consider clearly defined categories of eligibility. I refer, for example, to those people who have obtained home improvement grants and those people employing energy-saving measures. I refer also to disabled people, who were the subject of the amendment so unfortunately defeated earlier this evening. There are also properties which have been declared unfit for human habitation but which, according to a local authority inspector, could be made habitable if work was done on them. The Government would do well to reconsider this clause and ways of operating it more effectively.

Mr. Darling: This is a surprising proposal from the Government, as two Conservative Members have demonstrated. We must consider it in the light of other proposals within the Finance (No. 2) Bill. Home improvement is of crucial importance, especially in inner-city areas—one of which I represent. Central Edinburgh generally is not rundown, but had it not been for people improving their own houses, many of those properties would not be left standing today.

Instead of widespread demolition and the building of tower blocks, Edinburgh has been successful in maintaining both the new and the old town. Because most of the property takes the form of tenements, it is expensive to improve and maintain. Improvement to property is surely something that we should encourage, especially as there is usually a high demand for houses of this sort.

In my view, home improvement grants are the main vehicle that we should consider as a means of improving property. They target help in a way that mortgage tax relief cannot possibly do, because many people who live in houses that need improvement do not pay income tax, for various reasons. But, because of cutbacks, there has been restraint. In my constituency, 6,500 people are waiting for home improvement grants. If the Government are to withdraw the concession, perhaps they will consider directing some of the £200 million that will be saved towards the home improvement grants that have been so badly cut back, and constantly interrupted because of shifts in Government policy. If the home improvement grants system worked properly, I might not object so strongly to the proposal, although I recognise that there will always be room for objection.

11.30 pm

The Government have said that the reason for the withdrawal is that, on their calculation, there has been widespread abuse. That is very odd. The Government can put a figure on the abuse and yet, it seems, cannot do anything about it. As has been said earlier, it is quite easy to check whether a home improvement has been carried out, either by seeking invoices or by sending someone round to see what work has been done. I should have thought that even the most elementary training would equip a representative of the Inland Revenue to go and see whether an extension had been built, or double glazing had been put in.

It is important to realise that if an improvement grant cannot be obtained, financing the work oneself and obtaining tax relief can be the only way of carrying out improvements. As long as we live in a country which contains many houses below the tolerable standard, and property that will constantly need improvement and maintenance, it seems premature to withdraw this tax concession. The Government are very keen on stamping out DHSS abuse. If they were serious about the problem of abuse, it would be easy to institute a proper system of inspection. I should be interested to hear what the Paymaster General has to say about that.

I said at the start that the proposal must be viewed in the context of the Budget as a whole. It is important to bear in mind that yesterday, when we discussed the business expansion scheme, we nodded through a proposal that would enable Rachman-like landlords to thrive. In the same Bill, we find that ordinary decent people are to be denied the means of improving their homes.

Mr. Butterfill: Can we make it clear that Rachman was in the business of evicting tenants, whereas the BES is intended to put tenants into new accommodation? There is no question of "Rachman-like landlords". I wish that Opposition Members could get that into their heads. [Interruption.]

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Mr. Darling: It is not for me—thankfully—to maintain order in the Committee, Mr. Walker.

We are not discussing the business expansion scheme. I was making the point that we are all concerned to ensure that there are not concessions for one category of people and none for others. The BES is financing an aspect of housing that I consider thoroughly unwanted and disreputable; at the same time, it is removing a concession from ordinary decent people.

Following what has been said by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and his hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), I hope to see the odd Conservative rebel. Many people will be very upset to discover that they will receive no tax relief on home improvements. They will feel let down, and will not understand why tax breaks should be given to some while help is to be denied to others who wish to do up their houses. The Government should think again.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I was not minded to intervene when I first came into the Chamber but, having listened to my hon. Friends and Opposition Members, I just want to say one or two words to explain why I will be supporting the Government in the Lobby.

I came to the House to help simplify the system of taxation and lower the burden of taxation on our people. In the Budget we are cutting the basic rate of taxation from 27p to 25p and we have made a clear commitment that it will be dropped in the future to 20p in the pound. In addition, we have made the move to abolish top rates of tax and have one sole top rate of tax at 40p in the pound. In addition, we have also raised the main tax allowances by twice——

The Chairman of Ways and Means: Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the Committee has debated those matters and I hope that he will now address himself to clause 42.

Mr. Devlin: This is pertinent to clause 42 because it explains the whole rationale. If we are simplifying the taxation system and cutting the rates of tax as part of our strategy, it is wholly in order for us to look at ways in which we can get rid of tax breaks. If there is a lower burden of taxation on the individual, there is no need for taxation breaks. The point I was going to make——

Mr. Chris Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Devlin: I did not intervene in the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). I will be brief, so if points are to be made——

Mr. Smith rose——

Mr. Devlin: I am not minded to allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

Mr. Smith rose——

Mr. Devlin: Very well, I will allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for finally giving way. He is articulating an interesting and, in some respects, praiseworthy doctrine, which is that one should remove as many anomalies and reliefs from the tax system as possible. Would he extend that argument to mortgage tax relief as a whole, which has been stoutly defended by his Prime Minister——

The Chairman: Order. If the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) were to respond to that invitation, I would rule him out of order. I hope that we can now return to the subject of home improvement loans.

Mr. Devlin: My sole point in making this short speech is to show that breaks such as tax relief for home improvements are blunted the more the rate of taxation goes down. Since it is our stated intention to lower the burden of taxation on the individual, there is absolutely no need for breaks such as home improvement loans to continue. That is our strategy. It is perfectly clear and I agree with it wholeheartedly.

The question of luxury spending has been raised. I can think back to what has happened in my constituency over the past few years. When the A66 and the A19 were constructed, all those——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is inviting the Committee to widen the debate way beyond the scope of clause 42. There is nothing in that clause about the A19 or any other road. I hope that we can return to home improvement loans.

Mr. Devlin: There is inherent in clause 42 the question of double glazing. The point has been raised that many people—for example, those who live in Canonbury road —should have tax relief for double glazing. Those who lived near the A66 and A19 when the roads were built were offered funding by the Government to put in double glazing. Outside of such circumstances, there is no need for the Government to provide tax relief as well.

I see no reason why we should give tax relief on home improvement loans which are often used for the purchase of motor cars, for people to go on holidays, or for home improvements in the nature of swimming pools.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I shall intervene only briefly, as I have already spoken in the debate.

As we all know, citizens are responsible for paying tax equally, wherever they are in the United Kingdom, and they are equally treated within the law, wherever they live in this country. What worries me is that the Government are drawing a distinction between the treatment of a person in the south of England, who invariably has a mortgage in excess of £30,000—perhaps £50,000—and a person in the north of England, or in other parts of the kingdom, who might have a property worth substantially less, and a much lower mortgage.

For example, a fireman in Surrey may have a mortgage facility of £30,000, whereas a fireman in Workington may live in a house that is worth £25,000 but have a mortgage facility of only £20,000. I submit that a fireman in Workington, having paid exactly the same taxes as a fireman in London, is equally entitled to the tax concession available in these circumstances. He should not be singled out for special treatment and be told that, although he pays the same taxes, he is not entitled to the same tax concessions. Almost uniquely in that respect, the provision in the Bill is totally mistaken.

When the Treasury drew up its recommendations for this year's Budget, it might well have forgotten to consider the divisive nature of the recommendation. In parts of the United Kingdom outside the south, especially in the north of England, Wales and Scotland where property is cheaper, it is certainly in a far worse condition, particularly in the inner cities. We are locking people into property in parts of the country where values are lower and conditions are worse by insisting on a provision that prevents them from taking out an additional mortgage that has tax relief. I hope that the Minister will take that point carefully on board.

We are told in the notes on clauses that clause 42(1) provides that loans made after 6 April 1988 for home improvements will no longer qualify. However, this exclusion does not operate where the loan is for the erection of a new building which is not part of an existing residence on land which, immediately before the development, had no building upon it.

I can foresee circumstances—perhaps this is my devious mind working—where a person who wishes to build an extension can employ a builder to put up a building within, say, 6 or 9 in of the existing building, for which he would get tax relief and be within the law. After the friendly builder says, "Look, guv, you'd better get the man down from the bank to clear it so you get your relief," after the man from the bank has disappeared back to the bank, or whatever is the monitoring authority for all this nonsense, the builder will then say, "Right guv, I'll put the bricks up now and fill the cavities at each end." In effect, the extension will become part of the house. That is the way in which people will get round the provision.

Mr. Butterfill: Would the hon. Gentleman agree, being equally devious, that it might be possible for builders to devise bed-and-breakfast schemes for home owners, whereby they would buy the property and improve it, and then immediately, even within the same contract, sell it back improved, with the benefit of the whole loan qualifying for relief?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman intervened. He seemed to suggest that my proposition might well apply and that there would be such abuses. He drew attention to a further form of abuse, about which I do not know but which appears to be complicated in so far as there is a legal requirement. That approach may be adopted.

I have put two points to the Paymaster General. Can the right hon. Gentleman assure the Commitee that there will not be a subsidy for a construction 6 to 9 in. away from an existing building? What amendment will be made to this provision to ensure that that does not happen? I ask also for equal treatment within the law for people who pay taxes.

11.45 pm

Mr. Kirkwood: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised the serious point of the regional discrepancies that this measure will introduce. The problem will worsen as time goes on. I do not think that the Treasury has given any thought to this aspect. If it has, I should like to hear a substantive defence to the point which the hon. Gentleman made so eloquently. This matter applies not just to the north of England but to rural areas.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said that this proposal would do nothing to improve housing stock. People in England and Wales have the benefit of a statutory and regular house conditions survey, but we do not have that luxury north of the border because the Government refuse to pay for it. No one knows to what extent the housing stock in Scotland needs to be repaired, but I am certain that this measure in clause 42 will make the position substantially worse.

In constituencies such as mine, one of the most successful acts of the Conservative Government in 1983 was to give substantial improvement grants. They were extremely successful, especially in rural areas and in the private sector. The grants made a substantial difference to derelict farm cottages. The points which have been made about Wales also apply to my part of the world, where improvement grants are not sufficient to effect refurbishment of these properties and where more money is required to top up the grants. Clause 42 will bring that system to an end.

I return to the point made by the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). I am worried when young, first-time buyers purchase property for £15,000 and seek to improve it with an improvement grant of £15,000. The Government have not properly considered that matter, and I look forward to hearing the Paymaster General's comments.

We all have an interest in trying to eliminate abuses. I do not think that anyone is in favour of the stories about these grants which the popular press has been carrying in the past couple of years. The remedy, which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury has suggested, is to check abuses directly at source without abandoning the whole system.

The real abuse is the fact that the Government did not take the opportunity in the Budget to restrict mortgage tax relief to the standard rate of tax. The Government reduced the top tax rates but, if they wanted to save money and to end abuses, they would have restricted mortgage tax relief instead of making this ludicrous proposal.

Mr. Morgan: What happens if the effects of clause 42 and the business expansion scheme provisions for assistance in rented housing are combined? A young couple looking in an inner-city or coal mining area at an 1870 to 1914 property with a dodgy roof will compete against a BES-funded property consortium which, more than likely, can get tax relief at the top rate. How will that produce a simplified tax system, as the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) wants? How will it produce a level playing field for a young couple wanting to buy a house and a tax-subsidised business consortium that will obviously be able to outbid that young couple? That is the question to which we want an answer.

Dr. Marek: Not a week ago I had a letter from the Corlan Housing Association—a letter that some of my hon. Friends may also have received—saying that I will be aware of Corlan's role in providing sheltered housing for elderly people in Wales and that it has extended its services to include two "staying put" projects. The letter goes on:

> "Some of the projects' clients are eligible for a repairs or improvement grant but the majority live outside the housing priority areas and would have to wait some years. Many large repairs, therefore, are wholly privately financed by the owner-occupier taking out a maturity loan from a building society or bank. The loan is then paid back on an interest-only basis until the house is sold or the borrower dies, when the capital amount is recovered."

The association also says:

> "we feel that the new regulations regarding tax-relief on home improvements are bound to have a negative effect on the success of these projects by deterring both potential clients from taking up loans and lending institutions from offering them readily."

This is a housing association, not a private Rachmanite organisation of any kind. We shall be seeing such organisations, of course, once the business expansion scheme gets off the ground. [Interruption.] It is no use hon. Gentlemen saying "Jesus". They do not need to invoke the deity in this argument. It is quite wrong to do so.

Mr. Butterfill: Silly—not Jesus.

Dr. Marek: It is certainly not silly. Hon. Gentlemen will see the results and the truth that we have spoken in the years to come.

These "staying put" projects have been supported by the Welsh Office, yet now there is a danger that they will not go ahead. The letter goes on:

> "We would, therefore, suggest that exemption for those over retirement age should be actively pursued as a matter of urgency."

I think that there is a very good argument for the Government to take this clause away and say that they will think about it. We have heard the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) arguing along these lines, albeit in a different way, and we have heard a very cogent argument from the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) also for the abandonment of this clause. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will consider this very carefully.

There are ways of getting round this problem. For example, one could have better compliance procedures. It is very clear that in many cases bank managers simply do not ask whether the loans have gone towards home improvements or been used for a second holiday somewhere in Spain or Italy. Alternatively, the Government could define more narrowly those improvements that would qualify for loans. There is no doubt that it could be done if the Government had the will.

Some hon. Members—in particular, the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin)—actually said that some people want double glazing because they want double glazing. Why does the Conservative party think that double glazing is necessary only for someone who is near a main road or if there is a lot of aircraft noise? The point is that our housing stock is not very good compared with many European countries. There is something good about having double-glazed housing. If somebody wants double glazing he ought to be able to have it and he ought to be encouraged by the Government to have it.

Mr. Devlin: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We have put more money in the pockets of ordinary people with which to buy double glazing if they wish.

Dr. Marek: With respect, that is a facile argument. The average man in Britain has not had a lot of money put into his pocket. If the hon. Gentleman had been here throughout the debate he would have realised that it is the super rich who have a lot of money in their pockets. The average person does not have much money—certainly not enough to install double glazing in his or her house.

First-time buyers of dilapidated houses deserve a loan on which they can obtain relief in order to get on the first rung of the house-buying ladder. I always thought that that was what the Conservative party was about, but clearly I am wrong.

Mr. Brooke: In the interests of abbreviating this debate —this is the first occasion on which I have intervened—it may help the Committee if I make a brief general remark.

The removal of relief for interest paid on home improvement loans is part of the Government's general programme of reducing tax rates and removing tax reliefs which are complicated, uneven in their availability and expensive in terms of revenue or administrative costs. In future, mortgage interest relief will be concentrated on its primary aim, which is to help people buy their own homes.

I recognise that improvements which genuinely make more accommodation available for home ownership might merit some assistance but only a very small part of home improvement relief is devoted to such purposes. It is in any event only available to a borrower who has not used all his relief on house purchase. It is not true, as some of the more sensational stories have suggested, that the relief is widely used to subsidise the construction of swimming pools and tennis courts.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The right hon. Gentleman is not living in the real world.

Mr. Brooke: I went out of my way to say that those suggestions were not true.

But the fact is that about seven out of eight of these loans are used for installations such as double glazing and central heating. I do not deny the merit of home owners improving their houses and adding to their value in this way, but I see no reason why the tax system should subsidise this particular form of consumer credit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) addressed the Committee on observations made by the Building Societies Association. The Building Societies Association pressed for protection when a loan is replaced outside the borrower's control—for example, in the two circumstances of local authorities or commercial lenders closing their whole mortgage book. We think that very few will be affected: remaining local authority mortgage lending is small and much of that is almost certainly for purchase rather than improvement. Although the Building Societies Association is apparently unaware of this, we understand that the one commercial institution to which it refers has already disposed of its mortgage business, and not to a building society.

Other cases might arise, but it would be open to the lender to make special arrangements for any protected loans by, for example, simply letting them run to maturity. No doubt the BSA is correct in saying that the main motivation for replacing a loan would be to obtain a lower interest rate, but it does not follow that there would be less tax relief overall. The tax relief might well increase if the replacement loan carried extended terms or was on an endowment rather than a repayment basis. In the case of excessive interest rates of over 20 per cent. charged by some lenders, replacement current mortgage interest rates of around 10 per cent., even without tax relief, would be advantageous.

It is true that problems will arise when loans are replaced and have to be split into qualifying and non-qualifying parts. That is not a new problem. The abolition of improvement loan relief simply extends an existing problem. Increased competition in recent years has meant that lenders, including building societies, have been making loans for many purposes.

The main thrust of the considerable advertising of replacement loans is the consolidation of various loans into a replacement with a lower average interest rate. When that occurs it is relatively easy to isolate the purchase element being replaced. It would be much more difficult to establish to what extent the balance represented an improvement as opposed to, say, a car purchase element. There will be a strong incentive for borrowers to certify that the replaced loans were entirely for purchase or improvement.

As the legislation stands, and once we have disposed of the loans straddling 6 April, no loan will qualify for relief unless it is for purchase. This enables us to simplify the application forms and concentrate compliance checking on purchase loans. If, however, protection is extended to replacement loans, it means that loans made for improvements will qualify for relief if they replace pre-6 April loans. This will add to the compliance checking burden and policing will be difficult.

I agree that there is some merit in extending relief to replacement loans where the borrower has no control over the replacement. However, it would be difficult to confine legislation to this very small class. Extending protection to all replacement loans will give scope for avoidance, add to the administrative burden, and prolong the preferential tax treatment for existing compared with new borrowers.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will my right hon. Friend address himself to the point that the secondary mortgage market is growing? He has referred to one organisation which is engaged in the market. According to the BSA bulletin of July last year, there are no fewer than five organisations, all backed by major city institutions, engaged in the market. I am not sure that they represent a small number of people. Certainly the potential is there for a large number of people to be involved.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his further intervention.

The argument advanced by the building societies is that the abolition of relief for improvement loans is particularly harsh on poorer people purchasing rundown properties.

They suggest that relief should be allowed when loans are applied to repairs or improvements undertaken within 12 months of purchase. But this proposal amounts to a continuation of the present system with a 12-month time limit. Relief would continue provided the work was carried out within one year of purchase. This point was made by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury.

The same distribution of improvement work, with a heavy concentration on items such as double glazing, would probably prevail. If, however, an attempt were made to restrict relief to deserving improvements to dilapidated houses, considerable compliance and policing problems would arise. There would be a large grey area in determining a deserving improvement and the time limit would create a further inequity. Why should the person who can raise finance within a year of purchase get relief when a perhaps poorer person, who has to wait longer, is denied? Derelict housing is in any event often restored by a builder or developer who sells the improved property. The new owner can then obtain relief on a purchase loan.

In the case of council house purchases under the right-to-buy scheme substantial discounts of up to 60 per cent. are available. The 12-month period allowed for the occupation of a newly purchased property simply permits the purchaser to obtain mortgage interest relief if his move is, for example, delayed because of difficulty in selling his existing house. Therefore, it is not relevant as a precedent for a 12-month limit on improvement relief.

Mr. Battle: The view which the Minister has just expressed runs counter to the view of the National Home Improvement Council. I recall that on 17 March, a few days after the Budget, that council was addressed at a luncheon by the Minister for Housing and Planning. He was pressed on the matter and was asked to take back to the Treasury the view of the council that the proposals would not improve the housing stock. Certainly I was under the impression, as many people there were, that the Minister for Housing and Planning would have discussions with the Treasury on the matter. Can the Minister tell the Committee the outcome of the discussions between the Treasury and the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Brooke: I share with the Committee the point that it is not common custom to reveal conversations that may be going on within the Government. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to say that.

On secondary effects, first, it is suggested that tighter compliance checking of improvement loans has reduced VAT evasion—although no evidence is produced. Even if true, it is a strange argument to propose that income tax relief should be given so as to increase VAT compliance.

Secondly, it is claimed that improvement loan relief has not been abolished, but merely deferred, because a buyer of an improved house will qualify for relief on a purchase loan. But abolition ensures that the same improvement does not qualify for relief twice. Before abolition, the improver obtained relief for the improvement loan and then sold the improved property. The purchaser then obtained relief on a purchase loan covering the improved property. In future, relief will arise only on the purchase transaction. By denying relief to the improver there will be a genuine reduction in the cost of mortgage interest relief.

Thirdly, it is suggested that people will borrow more initially on purchase if they know that they cannot get the relief later in improvement loans. We doubt that. Most people will in any case borrow as much as they can afford from the beginning, at least up to the ceiling on tax relief.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) raised matters concerning abuse. The Inland Revenue has concentrated compliance checking on the higher risk, higher value loans, and has been making detailed investigations into a random sample of such cases. We estimate that about 1·5 million new home improvement loans are currently being taken out each year. To require and check the evidence that improvement work has been carried out in every case, as various hon. Members have suggested, would be a formidable administrative task. There is, too, the practical problem that most improvement loans are of necessity taken out before the work is carried out. Interest becomes payable immediately and tax relief is often allowed at source through the MIRAS system. If relief were not allowed until the work had been carried out, and the evidence supplied and checked, it would then have to be allowed retrospectively by the tax offices, which would add a further administrative cost and mean a bureaucratic paper chase.

Mr. Darling: Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that there have been significant cases of abuse? If so, what has been done about them? Or is he saying that he thinks there might be a problem, so the whole thing must go? Will he not hammer anyone else merely because of the odd case of abuse that there may be?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury acknowledged that abuse was running at 20 per cent. by the Inland Revenue account, which he described as a relatively low level. He did not quote the amount of money involved, which is £100 million. If our positions were reversed, I do not believe that Opposition spokesmen would seek to cover up an abuse of £100 million. The order of magnitude of the problem emerged after the Public Accounts Committee report.

Mr. Butterfill: To the extent that there might be abuse, would my right hon. Friend comment on the suggestion made by the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland that independent checking could be done at the expense of the borrower? Would it not be possible retrospectively to disallow relief and to include a penalty if abuse were discovered?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

I shall conclude the discussion about abuse. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised a point about the tax system applying throughout the United Kingdom. If I may give him an observation from a southern constituency, a borrower who is forced to pay £30,000 in a high-cost area in the south-east of England for purchasing purposes is then denied any opportunity of mortgage interest relief for an improvement loan under the existing system.

The hon. Member for Workington went on to ask me a question about an empty plot. Only a completely empty plot, plus a new building, qualifies. So a separate second building, such as the hon. Gentleman envisaged, would not qualify. I can recall Customs and Excise taking a similar interest, for policing purposes, in such cases, in the context of VAT.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the first proposition that I put to him, and that many in the north of England will want him to answer. We pay the same taxes in the north as people do in the south. Why should we not have an equal right to the full £30,000 facility? As, due to the arrangement of property prices in the United Kingdom, people in the south are more inclined to take up their tax allowance in full, why can we not have an equal advantage?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman answered that question himself, when he stated that the tax system applies throughout the United Kingdom. There is a particular level of relief and that applies everywhere.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) spoke about "care and repair" mortgages. These are usually for small amounts and to poorer people, for houses probably worth no more than £15,000. The National Federation of Housing Associations does not specify an income limit for qualification. It rightly explains that there are more attractive schemes for richer people with more valuable properties. However, these mortgages would rapidly gain wider appeal if they qualified for tax relief. Operating an income limit would be administratively difficult, as income is usually not known until after the end of the year, whereas interest relief under MIRAS is given by deduction at source at the time of payment. At present mortgage interest rates, the tax relief on a £2,000 mortgage is worth about £50 a year, or £1 a week. Without underestimating the value to a poor person, that seems a peculiarly cumbersome way to provide such a small improvement subsidy. A more sensible approach, involving the better targeting of improvement grants to those most in need, is outlined in the consultation paper "Home Improvement Policy" published by the Department of the Environment on 5 November last year.

Dr. Marek: Surely the targeting is already there, because wealthy people would not live in small houses costing £15,000.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman knows that if a similar abuse were found under other circumstances he would be the first to point it out.

As to abuse, the steps taken last year to tighten compliance checking will continue for the substantial number of improvement loans taken out before April, for which relief is continuing. For the future, it will be concentrated on its primary aim of helping people to buy their own homes. The removal of this relief, which, to a large extent, simply subsidises consumer credit, is in line with our general policy of reducing tax rates, broadening the tax base, and simplifying the tax system, and I ask my hon. Friends to support the clause.

Misleading Advertisements (Control)

12.23 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John Butcher): I beg to move,

That the draft Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988, which were laid before this House on 23rd March, be approved.

If approved, the proposed regulations would implement the Council directive 84/450/EEC, relating to the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member states concerning misleading advertising.

The directive has its origins in the preliminary programme for consumer protection adopted by the Council of Ministers in 1975. Technically, it is a harmonisation directive. In proposing it to the Council, the Commission argued that the differences between member states' laws on misleading advertising impede the free flow of goods by restricting international advertising campaigns and making it difficult to adopt a uniform marketing strategy.

The first draft of the directive required member states to enable complainants to approach a court to have a misleading advertisement prohibited. On the recommendation of the European Parliament, that was amended so that the appropriate powers and duties could be conferred on either the court or an administrative authority.

Against that background, the previous Government set up a working party, the Burgh committee, comprising the principal interests involved, to consider how the self-regulatory system of advertising control, administered by the Advertising Standards Authority, should be reinforced by legislation. The incoming Government in 1979 felt that the working party should first consider whether reinforcement of the self-regulatory system was necessary. Although we felt that the system generally worked well, the working party suggested that the Director General of Fair Trading could usefully be given a power to apply to the High Court for an injunction in those cases where the self-regulatory system had failed to prevent the publication of a misleading advertisement.

Subsequent negotiations on the directive enabled the United Kingdom to achieve two very important changes which allow us to implement it along the lines of the working party's recommendation. First, if a member state chooses to provide for complainants to have access to an administrative authority, that authority may be empowered either to decide on complaints itself, or to apply to the court for an order prohibiting a misleading advertisement. Secondly, the directive now enables us to give administrative authorities powers to require complainants to have prior recourse to other established means of dealing with complaints, including self-regulatory systems.

In the most general terms, the directive requires member states to ensure that they have adequate and effective means for the control of misleading advertising, to protect consumers, other businesses and the general public. In particular, those means of control must include measures for the legal prohibition of misleading advertisements.

[Mr. John Butcher]

The directive defines both "advertising" and "misleading advertising" very widely and that is reflected in the definitions in regulation 2 of the draft regulations. The draft regulations do not, incidentally, reproduce article 3 of the directive which sets out an illustrative list of examples of information that should be taken into account in determining whether advertising is misleading. In our view, the list is unnecessary. We consider that it does not add anything and, in practice, may even serve to narrow the interpretation of misleading advertising in the United Kingdom to a degree not intended by the directive. The definition of "advertisement" would extend to oral representations and leaflets, but an advertisement would be misleading only if, by its deceptive nature, it was likely to affect consumer behaviour or to injure a competitor of the advertiser. To be misleading, an advertisement would not need to have actually affected any consumer or competitor. It would be enough that the advertisement was likely to have such an effect.

Member states are required by the directive to provide arrangements enabling any person or organisation regarded under national law as having a legitimate interest in prohibiting misleading advertising to initiate legal proceedings against such advertising or to bring it before an administrative authority. An administrative authority must be competent either to decide on complaints or to initiate appropriate legal proceedings. The Government propose to entrust this competence to three named administrative authorities.

The principal authority would be the Director General of Fair Trading. Regulation 4(1) would put him under a duty to consider complaints, and regulation 5(1) would empower him, if he thought it appropriate, to apply to the High Court or, in Scotland, the Court of Session for an injunction or an interdict.

The duty to consider complaints would be subject to two qualifications. The director would not be required to consider a complaint if he considered it frivolous or vexatious. More importantly, he would be able to require complainants to satisfy him that they had exhausted the established means of dealing with complaints. In effect, this would be a discretion to refer complainants to other bodies. The main bodies would be the Advertising Standards Authority and the trading standards department of local authorities. He would, however, be able to refer complainants to other bodies as appropriate in relation to particular complaints.

The House will no doubt be familiar with the self-regulatory system of advertising control which is administered by the Advertising Standards Authority. The Government believe that self-regulation has, by and large, served the public well and have no wish to diminish its importance—hence the proposed power of the director to require prior recourse to established means. Regulation 4(4)(b) would require him to have regard to the desirability of encouraging the self-regulatory system.

The other principal established means would be the trading standards departments of local authorities. Their activities stem mainly from their enforcement functions under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 and other consumer protection legislation. Although the legislation which they enforce provides for criminal penalties for non-compliance, trading standards departments resolve most cases with the advertisers concerned.

I think that it is important that these regulations should not undermine the valuable work done already by trading standards departments. I believe that they, and the ASA, will be able to point to the director's new powers to encourage advertisers to co-operate voluntarily and withdraw or amend any offending advertisement.

I should mention that there are several other bodies operating to control misleading advertisements in particular sectors of the market that the director would no doubt wish to refer complainants to in appropriate cases. They are, for example, the Department of Health and Social Security for pharmaceutical products, the Building Societies Commission for advertising by building societies, and the Bank of England for banking services. The director would have a wide discretion to refer complainants to such bodies as he thought fit.

To enable him to fulfil his functions, regulation 7 would give the director a power to require information to be supplied to him, in particular to ascertain whether factual statements in an advertisement were true. Failure to comply with a notice from the director requesting information could be followed by an order from the court on the application of the director requiring the default to be made good. This power is necessary for those cases where the evidence as to whether an advertisement is misleading is uniquely in the possession of the advertiser. To be able to act swiftly and effectively, in the interests both of consumers and of rival advertisers, the director needs a power to obtain this information.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Is it intended that the power should be exercised before the director general applies for an injunction or during the injunction proceedings? It would seem sensible to get the information before applying for the injunction.

Mr. Butcher: The agency would normally be the first body that the director general would expect to have an investigation made. If the agency did not feel that it could secure the information it required, under standard practice, it would go via the director to the High Court —if that long-stop power were required—to obtain the information. I hope that that helps the hon. Gentleman. If he will allow me to continue, he may find that there is further clarification later in my speech.

In the case of broadcast advertising, and advertising transmitted by a licensed cable service, the administrative authorities would be the Independent Broadcasting Authority and the Cable Authority, respectively. Both are already empowered to decide on complaints. The IBA may, if it considers an advertisement misleading, refuse to broadcast it, and the Cable Authority may, under section 15(1) of the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984, issue a cable operator with a direction not to transmit an advertisement. In the event of a cable operator failing to comply with such a direction, the Cable Authority already has the power to apply to the court for an injunction or to revoke the cable operator's licence.

Under the draft regulations, both authorities would be able to consider a factual claim in an advertisement to be inaccurate if the person responsible for the advertisement failed to substantiate the claim when asked to do so by the authority. The relevant provisions are, in relation to broadcast advertising, draft regulations 8 and 9, and, in relation to cable advertising, draft regulations 10 and 11.

In implementing the directive we propose to allocate responsibilities between administrative authorities primarily on the basis of the medium carrying the advertisement. However, there would be one sectoral division. Investment business advertisements issued by or on behalf of a person authorised under the financial Services Act 1986 or the appointed representative of such a person would be excluded from those regulations. Implementation of the directive in that sector would be achieved by the provisions of that Act, and the administrative authority would be the Secretary of State or any person to whom he has transferred relevant functions under the Act. In practice, that would mean the Securities and Investments Board.

The SIB has issued rules governing the conduct of business by authorised persons, which include prohibitions on those types of advertising practice which the directive seeks to prevent. Some authorised persons will operate under the rules of self-regulating organisations or recognised professional bodies, themselves recognised by the SIB. SROs and RPBs are required to have rules providing investors with protection at least equivalent to that provided by the SIB's own rules. The SIB has power to apply to the court for an injunction restraining an authorised person from a breach of the SIB's rules or, in certain circumstances, those of an SRO or an RPB. Both the SIB and the Secretary of State have power to apply for an injunction restraining an authorised person from a breach of certain provisions of the Act itself, including its provisions as to advertising.

Therefore, regulation 3 would provide for the exclusion of investment advertisements issued by authorised persons and their appointed representatives. However, advertisements issued by persons exempt from the requirement for authorisation under the Financial Services Act would fall within the scope of the draft regulations. Regulation 3 would also exclude listing particulars and associated advertisements. The Government's view is that the directive does not apply in this area, as there is a set of specific directives which regulate these matters.

These regulations, if approved, would be a valuable addition to our already extensive regime of protection against misleading advertisements. Moreover, they would achieve that in a way that created no new criminal offences for traders; did not impose burdens on business; did not undermine the established means; imposed a negligible cost on the public purse; and afforded responsible businesses protection against unscrupulous competitors. In short, this measure is good news for both consumers and business. I commend it to all quarters of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): It is clear from the Minister's somewhat laboured explanation that we are dealing with a ramshackle structure. I am sure he did not wish to be misleading, but he succeeded in being confusing. It is not clear that this measure will operate in the simple and straightforward fashion that we want in controlling misleading advertising.

We welcome anything that will control, check and stop misleading advertising, and it is right that we should do so. We welcome such measures even more when they provide us with the interesting spectacle of a Minister from the DTI criticising misleading advertising. It is interesting to watch the Minister walking the fine line between his attachment to market forces and the need, forced upon him by Europe, to introduce some form of regulation.

We have two basic points of criticism. The first and most straightforward point is simply that the process of developing the regulations has taken far too long. This is the gestation period not of one elephant, but of a dozen elephants. Moreover, the way in which the regulations have been produced reflects no credit on the EEC. We do not expect otherwise. The EEC is used to producing—and is there to produce—such Euro-farces. But it reflects no credit on the Government either. The Government have dragged themselves slugfooted, clumsily, reluctantly, hesitantly and pedantically to the regulations. I should have added "belatedly" to that list.

At the end of that elephantine gestation period, we are left with a "ridiculus mus"—an allusion for the classically educated hon. Members on the Conservative Benches, who do not play much part in the Conservative party; they, I imagine, are nocturnal advertising men—which has been born deformed and hybrid, rather than high-bred. It is neither self-regulation nor proper, effective regulation. It is an uneasy compromise between the two, which really does not do enough to regulate the deficiencies in the existing system.

The European side of the story is quite straightforward. It is an early venture by the EEC into consumer protection, which is welcome as a departure from its usual role of producer protection—particularly in regard to producers of useful things such as dairy products. Its origins date back to 1975. The directive was first published in 1978, without proper consultation or any recognition of the way in which we do things in this country. Since then, the advertising industry has clearly had a long struggle to draw the teeth of the original proposals of 1975 to 1978.

The Advertising Association says:

> "A ten-year drafting process is not only wasteful in terms of money and time, but does little to improve attitudes to the Commission held either by industry or by anybody else. Worse, it puts an unacceptable strain on the essential partnership between consumers and industry."

It has not been the most enjoyable experience for the association. But that was only the beginning. After the European side, we hear the British side of this story of blunders.

The directive was finally adopted in a changed form in 1984, and the member states were supposed to comply with it by 1986. In 1988, we are finally making the appropriate provisions. I am not trying to argue that our control of misleading advertising is the best in the world. I would be suspicious of any such claim. Basically, it consists of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, which makes it an offence to publish false and misleading statements. But even that needs updating to conform with modern conditions.

I understand that the Trade Descriptions Act does not cover property, and therefore does not cover the misleading advertisements put out by estate agents. Some of them are so lyrical and devious that they are worthy of Conservative Central Office. I see that the Estate Agents Act 1979 is brought into the regulations. Are we now to assume that misleading advertising by estate agents—concerning the major purchase in people's lives—is now effectively controlled in a way that it was not controlled by the Trade Descriptions Act?

That is the first of our frameworks. The second relates to the powers of the IBA and the Cable Authority, which, on the whole, work reasonably well—except, in my view, when it comes to children's advertising, which can be totally misleading. My own kids set up a clamour for a toy which looks so effective, so lifelike, so exciting. When it is obtained, it certainly does not work in the way advertised on television.

Thirdly, there is the self-regulation of the Advertising Standards Authority. On the whole, I support self-regulation, and it works reasonably well. However, it is not perfect. It is important for us to keep up the pressure on the self-regulators because it can be a cosy conspiracy of industry managing itself. We should keep up the pressure to improve self-regulation, tighten the discipline and make it more effective. That is a power that we should exercise. It is right to be suspicious of self-regulation.

Self-regulation as it exists does not have effective teeth. There are areas that leave a lot to be desired, such as small advertisements, quack medicine advertisements, even loan advertisements. The Minister mentioned the financial services legislation. That covers investment advertising, but does it also cover the sort of loan advertising we see, particularly in the Sunday newspapers, where people are invited to pay less by paying more or to reduce their burdens to one monthly cheque, often at an exhorbitant rate of interest? That legislation certainly applies to investment advertising, but does it apply to loan advertising and will it be covered by the regulations?

A further point of clarification about the Advertising Standards Authority is that it needs some sort of statutory back-up. It needs some sort of machinery—perhaps a reserve power—to strengthen it. Our view is not invalidated by the fact that the European Commission agrres with it. Bad authorities do not necessarily make bad arguments. The Commission wanted a statutory reserve power. The interesting spectacle of the past four years has been to see the Government wriggling to fulfil their obligations to the Committion without upsetting their advertising friends and disturbing too much their own penchant for self-regulation, which extends everywhere except putting the burglars in charge of crime prevention.

We have had the spectacle of the Government wriggling in that fashion for a long time. Indeed, it began in 1980 when the Department of Trade and Industry working party recommended new powers for the Director General of Fair Trading as a back-up to the Advertising Standards Authority.

In 1984 the Government slugfootedly proposed that they should have power to seek court orders prohibiting the publication of misleading advertisements. In 1985 we had a consultative paper which made that proposal and which also said that there should be no direct access to the courts for individuals or organisations. It said that everything had to be channelled through the Director General of Fair Trading. The Government's arguments in that consultative paper are a criticism of the delays and inadequacies of the courts of law in this country.

In 1986, which was getting near the deadline appointed by the Commission, we finally had draft regulations. They reduced even more the powers given to the Office of Fair Trading by requiring that office to pay due regard to the desirability of encouraging voluntary control. Effectively, what was being said was, "Here is a power; do not use it."

That was followed by the next draft regulations in February 1987. The deadline had passed and Britain was behind. That draft dropped the proposed powers for the IBA and the Cable Authority to require information from advertisers.

Finally, there was a draft in February 1988. That draft, even at the end of that long, awkward, clumsy and stumbling process, fell foul of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. It was felt that the powers to require information from advertisers might be ultra vires in the sense that they were not required in the initial directive. The Committee went on to note that the regulations omit the provisions of article 3 of the directive, specifying matters relevant for determining whether advertising is misleading.

The Government did not want those requirements in their regulations. I can see why, given the nature of much of the Government's advertising. The directive proposes that an advertisement is misleading if it deceives in any way, including its presentation. That suggests that a lot of Government advertising, such as the advertising in Scotland on the poll tax, which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) has, would fall foul of it. It would be very difficult to justify it in terms of that rubric. At the end of the process, we end up with the regulations that we are debating tonight. It is a sad saga.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does my hon. Friend not think it curious that, although the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments published its comments in its 21st report, which was available at the end of March, the Minister did not reply to the vires point, the fact that the regulations cover only part of the directive, and also that the statutory instrument refers to implementing the whole directive? That is another example of misleading. The omission of advertising from the Minister's speech is curious. He made no reply to the Committee's recommendations.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree absolutely. The Joint Committee has thrown the Minister an embarrassing hot potato. He did not know what to do with the report. The Government thought they would allow time to lapse and forget about it, so that they could gloss over it. The Joint Committee was right to make those points, and the Minister was wrong not to take them up in his speech. He will still have to deal with them when he replies to the debate.

That is the end of a process during which, the Advertising Association tells us, it has done all the work, rather than the Department of Trade and Industry, and has made the running throughout the past decade. The association says:

> "The Advertising Association spearheaded an industry working party which was in close liaison with the Department of Trade and Industry at every stage of the directive's development. This working party included representatives of the advertisers, the advertising agencies, the television companies, the ASA, the IBA, the Cable Authority, the CBI and every vested interest under the sun.

This is a Government of vested interests. We represent the consumer in this matter. The DTI has given full and free rein to every vested interest under the sun. That is why it has all taken so long. We are now at the end of a long and painful process.

The Government are one of the major vested interests in this whole process. It is difficult for the Government to regulate misleading advertising properly and effectively when they do so much misleading advertising. The television campaign on "Job Start" has become a shabby way of shaking people off the unemployment register and is advertised as a dynamic new beginning.

The misleading advertising on the poll tax in Scotland falls foul of the rubric. Misleading advertising from the Department of Trade and Industry tells us about the enterprise initiativ—"Take it"—as if the Department was doing more for industry, when it is doing less than any of its European competitors and less than industry needs. It is handing over its work to consultancies with the aid of a gigantic consultancy "slush fund" that is being promoted by the DTI's own misleading advertising.

It is clear that the Government do not want the machinery to have effective teeth, because those teeth will probably end up in the backside of Lord Young of Graffham-Saatchi-Thompson as the most misleading advertiser in this country. We want a Government of advertisers for advertisers by advertisers who do not want effective regulation.

The Opposition will not oppose the regulations, but we certainly will not rejoice at an achievement that is inadequate and has taken so long and been so clumsy. It has taken eight years for us and 13 years for the European side. We will not indulge in any hymn of praise; we shall just have a quiet laugh. It will provide the Minister with a good plt for his next rock opera—one that he can advertise, even under the terms of these regulations, as combining the charm of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), the compassion of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) and the lewd bawdiness of the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), and get away with it.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I must point out, yet again, that the Minister did not make any reference to the 21st report of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. I should have thought that, in a debate on the Floor of the House, the Joint Committee's efforts deserved some sort of reply other than the memorandums from the Department of Trade and Industry which are printed in the report.

On regulation 7, the Committee said that the power to require any person to furnish to the Director General of Fair Trading such information as may be specified or described was not contained in the EEC directive. There was no specific provision for that power, so we asked the Department of Trade and Industry for a memorandum. The Department said that, in effect, although there was no direct provision, it was necessary to have the power to implement the directive. Since the Department thought that that was a reasonable point of view, it decided to use those powers.

That is not the basis of legislation. If the Department happens to think when looking at subordinate legislation that the powers should exist, but they do not exist in primary legislation, it is not incumbent upon that Department to assume that those powers exist and put them forward. On page 3 of our report, we said:

> "In the Committee's view, these arguments, however cogent they may be on the question of the expediency of including Regulation 7, do not answer the question whether in the circumstances there is power under s.2 of the 1972 Act to do so"— that is, the European Communities Act 1972. The Department does not have power to provide regulation 7 of the statutory instrument; therefore, we reported on the ground that there was a doubt about the vires.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) pointed out, the regulations omit article 3 of the directive, which sets out a definition of "misleading" and includes a number of illustrations of what "misleading" might constitute. That practice is precedented in other primary legislation. The explanatory note to the regulations suggests that they depend on the implementation of the whole directive. The explanatory note says:

> "These Regulations implement Council Directive No. 84/450/EEC . . . relating to misleading advertising."

The explanatory note should have said that the regulations implemented parts of that Council directive. That would have been a more honest and accurate account. As the Minister knows full well, these regulations have the full power of law and, in that, there are sanctions to apply the law and the user should have legislation that is as clear and free from ambiguity as possible. An explanatory note that states that the whole of the directive is being implemented is misleading when, on the admission of the Department, certain aspects of the directive are omitted. It does not give much confidence that the terms of the directive will be implemented with enthusiasm by the Minister when his own regulations appear to be misleading at the outset.

I hope that at the conclusion of this short debate the Minister will turn his mind to the conclusion of the Joint Committee, which is not a very powerful body, although it is set up by the House of Commons to weed out the discrepancies and ambiguities in delegated legislation, because delegated legislation has the same force of law as primary legislation. I remind the Minister that the Committee has a majority not of Opposition Members but of Government Members. Yet the Committee has made these points and it seems to me that it is incumbent on the Minister, in accounting for his actions to the House, to give a full explanation of the omissions and deficiencies that have been drawn to his attention in our 21st report.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) welcomed the regulations, although he made it quite clear that if they had been prepared by a Labour Government they would have been more severe and more extensive. For many years hon. Members on both sides of the House have wanted to do something about the statutory back-up to the powers of the Advertising Standards Authority. I was certainly engaged as Minister of State for Consumer Protection up to 1979 in trying to introduce something along the lines of the regulations which are before us tonight.

The paradox is that, if we had wanted to legislate and there had not been the European directive, it would not have been possible to have something before us tonight in the form of regulations which could be concluded in an hour and a half. We would have needed primary legislation, which would have had a Second Reading and no doubt occupied at least half a day in the House and several days in Committee. I am not saying that that is necessarily a good way of going about these things, and the lesson for future legislation, particularly on consumer protection and matters of regulation, whether involving companies or trading standards, is tht there is a very strong case for stating principles in legislation and giving the House an opportunity with the European Communities Act to pass legislation which is long overdue without having to rely upon the legal basis of a directive from Europe. So I think that in drafting future legislation on consumer matters, advertisement, and so on, that is necessary.

These regulations have been far too long in coming before the House. The last Labour Government negotiated with the advertising business. I found its members extremely professional, very quick and very co-operative, and it would have been possible by 1979, or certainly by 1980, had it not been for delays in Europe, to present something along these lines, given adequate parliamentary time. That is the great advantage of having regulations rather than an Act of Parliament.

It has taken altogether, as the Minister made quite clear, about 13 years from conception to execution to get a statutory back-up to the Advertising Standards Authority. That is far too long and in future we want to see a bit more speed. For instance, there has been on the stocks for a very long time a directive about doorstep sales, which is one of the most blatant forms of consumer abuse. Goods are sold on the doorstep to vulnerable people who do not have the chance of obtaining independent advice. That directive ought to be implemented as rapidly as possible.

Is Lord Young of Graffham to be the first to receive an injunction under the present regulations, because he goes on television, spending the advertising slush fund, telling us that we will have a single integrated market by 1992. Hon. Gentlemen may say that I have gone over the top, but we have had a modest regulation on which there has been almost total agreement between the industry, the Labour, Conservative and Liberal parties and everybody else as far as I know and on which there has been unanimity for 13 years, including the virtual unanimity in Europe, and it has taken 13 years, on a matter which is uncontested an which comes before the House at 1o'clock in the morning, to put it into practice. Shall we really have a single integrated European market by 1992 on matters which will be highly controversial? I should have thought that one of the first persons to suffer what I think is called an interdict in Scotland and an injunction in England would be Lord Young of Graffham.

My second question concerns a technical matter. Is it intended that there should be a power to obtain ex parte injunctions under the tax regulations? If the order obtained by the Director General of Fair Trading in the courts is the last resort, and if people are expected to explore other avenues first, I should have thought that the ex parte injunction was inappropriate. I hope that the Minister will say something about that.

Thirdly, I should like the Minister to say whether the regulations broaden the control over misleading information beyond the statutes that give rise to present liability for breach of regulations under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 or obligations under the Trade Descriptions Act 1972. I am thinking, for instance, of the misleading advertising by people such as Allied Carpets, Queensway Discount Warehouses, or MFI before it merged with another firm. There are two institutions in Britain which have continuous sales. One is Her Majesty's Government and the other is the discount warehouse—Allied Carpets, Queensway Discount Warehouses and so on. The prices advertised at such discount stores are those at one of their stores in a remote part of the country, and clearly that is misleading to consumers.

I hope that the Minister will say that there will be discussions with the Director General of Fair Trading and the Advertising Standards Authority to widen the scope of the code of practice because criminal sanctions have proved peculiarly inadequate in such cases of misleading price claims, irrespective of the Consumer Protection Act, and whether those regulations willthen be available to prevent the kind of abuse of consumer information that has been commonplace for far too long among discout warehouses.

1.6 am

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I must make it clear that, committed as we are to the extension of consumer rights, Democrats welcome the regulations and their effect in reining in misleading advertisers. It is a pity that the regulations have been so long in gestation, but they are, nevertheless, a necessary and important addition to the present self-regulatory powers.

No one should doubt the value of the changes to ordinary men and women. The regulations introduce a legal backdrop that begins to give some teeth to the current system where that is necessary, in particular, where quick action is needed.

Nevertheless, there remain several outstanding concerns, some of which have been aired tonight and more of which should be aired. The first is that protection is needed not only against advertisements that are misleading—that is the limit of the regulations—but, for example, against the 12 per cent. of cases referred to the ASA in 1986 which concerned adverts thought to be distasteful, indecent or in some other way offensive. Of those, more than one in three alleged that adverts were distasteful because of their depiction of women.

Indeed, one of my constituents complained to me of the junk posted through her door by a tabloid newspaper advertising and illustrating pornographic videos and magazines—material that went first into the hands of her children. The present advertising code looks at whether a majority would react, or whether a minority finds advertisements grossly offensive, but it can take precious little account of whether material will reach the hands of minors, as in my constituent's case, or of the offensive treatment of women.

If women are viewed primarily as sex objects, there is not a great deal that the ASA can do. We still find near-naked women used to sell car parts, or what have you, in the press. The cinema, I regret to say, goes further. Atmospheric scenes evocative of rape are not uncommon and in too many cases go beyond acceptable limits.

The present self-regulating system seems increasingly unable to address the problem and it is not touched on in the regulations. During the long interval, has the Minister addressed the problem? He should do more than ask advertisers and businesses what they think, because clearly they have a vested interest in anything which may sell their products. Has the Minister considered whether anything can be done to tighten control?

Of still more immediate concern is the overstopping of political boundaries. I do not suppose that the Government have done much about this; if they have, they have no told us about it. There is a thin line between politics and public information, as the Goernment themselves pointed out when they banned local authorities from engaging in campaigns. Hon. Members have already referred to some of the campaigns which the Government ae involved in.

Public information on AIDS or the single European market which is to come into effect in 1992 may b one thing, but what of more controversial advertising on the poll tax or changes in benefits? What about the way in which the problems are glossed over and only the positive side is presented in an attempt to promote policies which are politically controversial and which are not of general public interest?

We are told that the IBA has refused departmental advertising on a number of occasions. Will the regulations apply to the Government's own advertisements? Have they considered the effect that the regulations will have? They will have to be careful when they put the regulations into practice. It is reported that the will spend £1 million on the English and Welsh poll tax campaign. We have already heard about the Scottish campaign. When they go ahead with the English and Welsh campaign I would not be surprised if they were the first victims of their own regulations. They may be had up for misleading the public about the campaign being part of the Government information service when it is blatant party political propaganda, paid for this time not by local authorities through the rates but by central Government out of the public's income tax contributions.

At the end of the day it is not Government, advertisers or big businesses which have the greatest interst in the proposals. It is the ordinary man or woman who interferes in no one else's life but is prey to small-time sharks who are interested only in making a fast buck at someone else's expense. Mail order advertising is one area of which I hope the Minister will take particular account.

Another that has hit some of my constituents are advertisements offering so-called work at home. There are several types but the most common advertisement demands a fee or a deposit for an instruction pack on how to start earning. Large earnings are promised with little effort or skill required. But the pack brings no more than a number of display cards and suggested advertisements to be used at the consumer's expense to recruit—yes—more home workers. In other words, the scheme recruits ever more agents to recruit ever more agents, with no real product at the end. The purchaser of the pack has to choose between losing his money—the sums involved mean a lot to the individuals who put money into these schemes—or trying to rip off someone else to recoup what he has already lost.

I took up a case with the Minister. My constituent from Mount Hawke had fallen prey to just such an unscrupulous scheme. The Minister's response was interesting. He offered little consolation. The Department was aware of such rip-offs and he quoted the ASA code. Indeed, he mentioned that tonight's new regulations might control such conmen; he hoped so anyway. But he did not seem certain. He concluded:

"It remains to be seen whether 'money making' schemes like this will be brought under control."

Without effective control, the Minister was only able to suggest that my constituent write to the advertiser to say "he considers that he was misld by their literature and demanding a refund of his money."

It is not very realistic if, in spite of the regulations and the ASA's code, all a person such as my constituent can do is write to the shark in question at a PO box number through which he will not be traceable. In this case, the shark did not even seem to have a box number; he had an address which turned out to be one, but it did not look like one.

So we must hope that the regulations will be effective. More effective protection for the ordinary men a nd women who suffer from such advertisements is needed. But the fear remains that the regulations will not work. The Minister expressed it in the letter to which I have referred. If the regulations do not work, I and my hon. Friends will return to the House to seek greater protection for consumers—the ordinary men and women who are always the losers.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The House should be grateful to the European Commission for taking this initiative, which has led the Government to take this rather timid step towards more effective controls on advertising standards.

The Minister spoke about the powers of the Director General of Fair Trading and our beleaguered local authority trading standards departments. He might also have referred to the most effective agency of all in enforcing standards of advertising—the "That's Life" programme, which seems to be the ultimate deterrent for many charlatan operators. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) said that Lord Young of Graffham would be the first person to be hauled before the courts under the new regulations, but I suspect that we can beat him to that in Scotland.

The Secretary of State for Scotland has been inundating the letter boxes of Scotland with junk mail such as that described by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor). The utter hypocrisy of Government Departments is a serious problem. They legislate to prevent local authorities from advertising certain aspects of their work, but blatantly spend large sums of public money on advertising the Government's political point of view. There have been recent spectacular examples of that in Scotland with the poll tax, as my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) mentioned.

I have a copy of a leaflet circulated by the Scottish Office last autumn at public expense. It was sent to every household in Scotland, and was misleading in many ways. It was a nice glossy leaflet with pictures of smiling people who will evidently be eager to pay the poll tax in due course. The leaflet was an attempt to sell the poll tax to an uninterested and hostile population in Scotland. It begins:

"What is the Community Charge?

It is a contribution payable by each adult to their local authority".

The word "contribution" implies that there is something voluntary about the poll tax. This is the soft sell approach.

[Mr. John Home Robertson]

"How will the Community Charge differ from domestic rates?

Domestic rates are paid by householders, less than half the adult population."

That is almost true, but the Government can make that assertion only by assuming that spouses are not part of the household. If we include the spouses of ratepayers, about 80 per cent. of the population of Scotland are ratepayers.

"Will those on low incomes have to pay, such as the unemployed and other benefit recipients?

Yes, but the rebate scheme will take account of their ability to pay."

Those of us who followed the interesting debates initiated by the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) on the English poll tax Bill will know that the rebate scheme takes only limited account of the ability to pay. Once again, we have demonstrated that that leaflet, circulated by the Government at public expense, was misleading and deceitful advertising material.

There is lots of stuff about "self-regulation". The Independent Broadcasting Authority and the Advertising Standards Authority apply certain standards to commercial advertising, but what self-regulation is there over misleading and deceitful Government advertising? I hope that the Minister will say something about that.

That is not the end of it. Another booklet has been circulated in Scotland, entitled,

"You and the Community Charge—A step by step guide."

Again, that has nice little graphics of smiling people, including, rather significantly, a smiling policeman and a man holding a shovel and also smiling. No doubt he is equally enthusiastic about the prospect of paying the poll tax. Among other things, it poses the question:

"Will the Registration Officers be able to go wherever they want to get information for their Registers?"

The answer is:

"No. The inquiry form will always be the main source of information. The Registration Officers will not be able to approach people's neighbours."

The registration officers and their staff this very week in Scotland, in my constituency and in Strathclyde, are trying to get information from neighbours about who is resident in which household. That is another example of a deceitful assertion, seeking to reassure people in Scotland about the way in which the poll tax will be operated.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): It is even more misleading than that. When I received my form to fill in, it had my name and that of my wife on it. How the inquiry form can be the main source of information to the registration officer when it already has that vital information, I do not understand.

Mr. Home Robertson: My hon. Friend is right. We could have an interesting debate about the poll tax, but I suspect, knowing the stringent standards that you apply to these debates, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I might run into trouble were I to do so. The point is that this soft sell, coming from the Secretary of State for Scotland, at public expense, is misleading and deceitful advertising.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: I would not want to accuse the Government, wrongly, of deliberately and directly misleading people in a leaflet, but the leaflet says that people cannot be approached for gossip and rumour about their neighbours. We were told in the Committee considering the Bill to introduce the poll tax into England and Wales that they could. Is there to be a different situation in Scotland—in which case, I am rather concerned for my constituents, and why they are being treated differently—or are the Government completely wrong in that leaflet?

Mr. Home Robertson: The answer is that there is to be equality of misery between the constituent parts of the United Kingdom, except that we are getting it a year earlier than the south.

The substance of the debate concerns advertising standards and the need for adequate protection of citizens, traders and everybody else against deceitful advertising. It comes ill from a Minister in this Government, whose colleagues in another Department are putting about misleading and deceitful advertising material at public expense, to give us such an assurance. I welcome the principle of more effective controls of such advertising, but I want an assurance that Government Departments and Ministers will be subject to the same standards. If such standards are to apply, the Secretary of State for Scotland should be hauled up before the appropriate authority, or court, pretty damn quick, and that would be a useful step in the right direction.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): I rise to ask my hon. Friend the Minister two questions. Will he clarify how the regulations interrelate with the misleading price indicators code, which he is currently drafting under the terms of the Consumer Protection Act 1987? Will action under the regulations in any way prejudice subsequent action that someone may wish to take on the subject of misleading price indicators under the Consumer Protection Act?

Mr. Butcher: A large number of questions have been raised and in the time available I shall do my best to respond to each of the specific questions that have been put to me.

First, in regard to loan advertisements, consumer credit advertisements are regulated under the Consumer Credit Act and enforced by the trading standards department under the Director General of Fair Trading. Such advertisements may also be controlled under these regulations by the Director General of Fair Trading, or in the case of a television advertisement on independent television by the IBA, or by the Cable Authority in the case of cable advertisements.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) went on to say that we were talking about a ramshackle structure, that it would take too long and that we were tardy in our reaction in comparison with other members of the European Community. My brief answer to that is that an extensive regime is already in place in the United Kingdom and these regulations provide a long-stop, albeit a potentially draconian long-stop. Secondly, it was necessary for us to co-ordinate the implications of the regulations with the financial services legislation, and, thirdly, the United Kingdom has negotiated the system which we wanted to fit in with our regime. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was entirely correct in his assertion that we are behind the European Community. Several other member states have not yet implemented such measures.

The question was asked why the Government have not provided complainants with direct access to the courts. That would place an excessive burden on the court's resources, and I have every confidence that the Director General of Fair Trading will be able to identify those complaints which require action. I used the expression "long-stop". In most cases, we would expect the director general or an appropriate administrative body to take the bulk of the action required. Only if he is faced with a particularly serious action will the director general need to go to the High Court for an injunction. Of course in a particularly serious situation we are complying with the requirements of the directive.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) rightly reminded us of the very important role of the Joint Committee. I made reference to that Committee in my opening comments—perhaps at too high a speed. The hon. Gentleman, amongst other things, raised the Committee's doubts about the vires for this power. I do not share those doubts. I consider that it is fundamentally a question of fact rather than law. The director general has considerable experience of the operation of a similar injunctive power under section 35 of the Fair Trading Act 1973, and he has found that the lack of a power to require the production of relevant information about business conduct has significantly restricted his ability to take effective action under that Act. If advertisers are able to frustrate the operation of these regulations, we shall not be meeting the requirements of the directive. Therefore, I consider that the power is quite justified.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Why did the Department, after initially proposing that the IBA should have the same power to require evidence from advertisers, withdraw that proposal and not give the IBA such powers?

Mr. Butcher: The IBA has a very clear sanction to stop an advertisement which does not satisfy it. I believe that it has a good track record in exercising its responsibilities in that regard. The regulations deal with the prevention of advertising, if it is felt that it is likely to mislead. Penalties are dealt with in different legislation—for example, in the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. All hon. Members will commend the way in which the Independent Broadcasting Authority has used its preventive powers. I do not believe that it wants them to be enhanced.

Mr. Cryer: The point is not that the powers are not needed to implement the directive but whether the Minister has the power to implement the directive that is provided for by primary legislation. Merely because the director general thinks that the powers might be useful does not give the Minister the right to provide for them in the regulations. That can be done only by means of primary legislation. Is the Minister able to point to any primary legislation that would provide him with that power?

Mr. Butcher: Statutory powers are provided in the Trade Descriptions Act, and they have been used by trading standards officers. The regulations do not challenge those powers. We want to encourage trading standards officers to take advantage of the penalty powers that are provided for in the Act. We also want them to take advantage of the power to stop, investigate and police, and this is provided for in the regulations. I shall examine the record carefully tomorrow. If what I have said is not clear to the hon. Gentleman, I shall write to him, expanding on the points that he made in his first intervention.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) asked about doorstep selling, about the possibility of ex parte injunctions and about continuous sales. The directive on doorstep selling has been implemented. Regulations have been made and they come into force in July. As to the possibility of ex parte injunctions, interim relief is available for urgent cases, as regulation 6(1) makes clear by its reference to an interlocutory injunction. However, it will be the exceptional, not the normal case. As for continuous sales, misleading prices are to be dealt with by regulations that are to be made under part III of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 and by a code of practice that is to be approved under the Act. Misleading advertisement regulations will also be available, if necessary. If there is doubt, changes will be made to the Advertising Standards Authority code. I hope that that explanation helps the hon. Gentleman, but again I shall examine the record and if there is a point with which I have not dealt I shall write to him.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) referred to the exploitation of women in advertising and asked why the regulations should not be used to restrain their exploitation. I recognise that some people are offended by the way in which women are represented in some advertising. The agencies that have a regulatory function in relation to matters of general taste apply the standards that they believe to be held by most people. Most advertising conforms to those standards. In any event, the regulations are not an appropriate occasion for addressing such matters, as the directive is confined to misleading advertisements.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether the regulations deal with the advertising of pornographic material. He may not have mentioned dubious telephone services, but that is also part of the question. The regulations will enable the director general to seek a court injunction against a misleading advertisement, if he considers that it is appropriate to do so. The regulations are not the way in which to deal with the wider subject of other methods of marketing goods and services, to which some people object.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: If I see an advertisement featuring a scantily clad girl, which promises to tell me on the telephone about "My first ride" and I then ring up and hear about pony-trekking on Exmoor for 10 minutes and am dissatisfied with that, do the regulations provide me with a means of redress?

Mr. Butcher: If the lady in question had satisfied the hon. Gentleman's objective and he really was asking for a heavy-breathing telephone call, that would be covered by the Telecommunications Act 1984. It is an offence to send an obscene message over a telecommunications system, as he will know because he served on the Committee which considered that Bill.

It is not a question of obscenity, so far as the misleading aspect of such a message is concerned, if it is found to be harmless. We must ask whether the advertisement was legal, decent, honest and truthful. I do not wish to pronounce judgment on that, but, as a preliminary stab, I would say that it may not have been truthful, as the hon. Gentleman may have expected a heavy-breathing conversation and received a much more harmless one. I suspect, therefore, that the advertisement was misleading in that it was not truthful.

I turn now to the question of political advertising. I appreciate that there was a great temptation on the part of Opposition Members to indulge in leg-pulling about my Department's major campaign. I make no apology for that whatsoever. There is a strong reason for marketing the approach to 1992. I wish to quote from the Daily Mirror editorial of 12 March which states:

"1992 must not become another 1066.

Yesterday, Mrs. Thatcher and the Trade Secretary, Lord Young, launched a campaign to make all of us, employers and workers alike, aware of what is needed.

We must all support it. It is not a party political matter. Our future rests on its success."

I assume that most Daily Mirror editorials are now cleared with the Leader of the Opposition, so I ask the hon. Member for Great Grimsby to take another look at his comments when he made his accusations of politicisation of some of our advertising. We stated clearly in the White Paper that "One of the aims in developing and publishing the objectives of the DTI was to give greater cohesion to its organisation and policies. The policies which DTI operates and the services which it offers to industry must be limited in number, coherent in approach and tightly defined so that they can be clearly understood and recognised by people in business. They must be well marketed and promoted."

I have heard accusations from some Oppostion Members that many of the Department of Trade and Industry's schemes and methods of assisting business and commerce have not been properly marketed, and that it is difficult for businesses in their constituencies to obtain what is available. We have been advised time and time again to use the most powerful medium, which is television. We are doing that and our advertisements correspond clearly with that legal, decent, honest and truthful requirement placed upon us by current practices.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby tempted Conservative Members and indulged in a little leg-pulling about the politicisation of Government advertisements. The Opposition should take another look at some of the advertisements that appeared in the dog days of the Labour Administration in the 1970s. There is a magnificent headline in a national advertisement put out by the then Labour Government in 1975, which says:

"We must all co-operate in these difficult times to save our country . . . Inflation. We can beat it together."

By contrast, the Department of Trade and Industry's advertising campaign says to British industry, "Be a winner". We are saying, "This is how you can win. This is the information that you need, come and get it." What I have here is entirely negative and should be a political advertisement. I shall advise Conservative Central Office to reproduce this advertisement in the press as it stands so that people can be reminded of what it was like back in 1975.

A second advertisement, which I have here, reads:

"The Government's Anti-Inflation programme came into full effect on August 1st. This is what it will mean to you."

It is a full-page advertisement, and it is not Bernard Ingham—it was the Government of the day. It says:

"Your pay-rise will be limited to £6 a week in the next 12 months . . . If you earn £8,500 a year, or more, you will not get any increase at all . . . Action will be taken to limit price rises on some of your basic foods . . . If you own any shares your dividents will not be allowed to rise by more than 10% over last year."

That advertisement should become a political advertisement sponsored by Conservative Central Office. It should be reproduced in its entirety so that people can reach their own conclusions.

We are putting out advertisements on the "can do" principle. Britain can do it. These advertisements remind us of the days when the Government said, "You cannot do it. It is tough. Our country is under threat."

Mr. Home Robertson: The hon. Gentleman complains of leg-pulling by Opposition Members, but he is doing a little bit of his own. He is amplifying our argument. We quoted examples involving the poll tax and the Minister is quoting examples from some time ago. I have not seen all of the advertisements from which he is quoting, so I do not necessarily accept that they are examples of abuse. Does he accept that there is an overwhelming case for effective controls over the standard of advertising by Government Departments? This debate is supposed to be about controls over deceitful advertising in other sectors. Can the hon. Gentleman give us any undertaking that there are to be such controls over Government advertising?

Mr. Butcher: The controls are adequate, indeed very adequate. They have been enhanced today. I am afraid that I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he is in his confessional and implying that the Labour party may have been guilty of putting out the kind of advertising which he accuses us of putting out. The controls exist. The IBA has a clear stance. It has agreed that our advertisements are perfectly in keeping with non-party political objectives, I assume. I commend the regulations to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988, which were laid before this House on 23rd March, be approved.

PETITION

John Ruskin High School, Coniston

1.45 am

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): You will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I intended to present a petition to the House last Friday, but that, in view of the other business before the House and the multitude of other petitions which were to be presented, I explained that I would present it at some other early date. That day is today, although it is now 1.45 am.

The background to the petition is a strong feeling in my constituency about the proposal to close a school in Coniston in the Lake District. It is a correctly, carefully and beautifully drafted petition which is addressed thus:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of the Governing Body of John Ruskin High School situated at Coniston in the County of Cumbria and the Parish Councillors of Coniston, Broughton in Furness, Blawith, Claife, Hawkshead, Lowick, Torver, Satterthwaite, Skelwith, and Kirkby in Furness, in the said County of Cumbria, Sheweth;

That the inhabitants of High Furness whose children attend John Ruskin School are eminently satisfied with the efficiency, viability and educational standards of the School which is the only Secondary School in the High Furness Area. The School at the present time is occupied to 86 per cent. of its capacity and is attractive to parents from well outside its formal catchment area.

Your petitioners feel strongly that any move to close John Ruskin High School would have severe detrimental effects on the social structure of our area and would furthermore remove any real possibility of parental choice in the field of secondary education.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will support the continuance of this exceptional and much loved school by opposing the proposal of Cumbria County Council to close the said John Ruskin High School.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

The petition has my warmest support. I have previously brought this matter to the House and it concerns a battle which I believe must be won. I hope that the House will support my constituents in the sentiments expressed in their petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Clyde Submarine Base

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

1.46 am

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): The subject of this debate is a matter which was brought to my attention by an article in the New Civil Engineer of 28 April 1988, referring to the foundation problems associated with the building of the shiplift and finger jetty in the Clyde submarine base at Faslane. In a moment I will detail the specific nature of the problems referred to in that article. However, I am concerned at the response given by the authorities to the media who attempted to follow up the matter, who were met by a wall of silence from the Property Services Agency—which, regretfully, seems to be the norm for departments with responsibility with anything to do with the Clyde submarine base, whether or not they have any security implications.

There is failure to recognise that my constituents have a legitimate interest in the affairs of the Clyde submarine base. The base itself occupies a considerable part of my constituency. In fact, the MOD owns 16 per cent. of the land within the entire constituency and as a consequence has annexed the most beautiful part of my constituency —the peninsula around Gareloch—with considerable detriment to tourist potential. The latest Garelochhead bypass development, which stretches for more than 10 miles, has scarred the landscape and I have received numerous complaints from residents of both Helensburgh and the peninsula on the environmental destruction that is taking place as the result of the work undertaken by the Ministry.

Within the next few years the Trident programme will mean further inconvenience to the community. An increasing burden will be placed on the infrastructure, with a tremendous increase in traffic moving in and out of the base. MOD figures indicate that more than 1,500 lorries a day will be using the roads of Dumbarton constituency —roads which are already crowded and in need of upgrading. That will undoubtedly result in considerable inconvenience to my constituents and has worrying implications for tourism. Many tourists will be put off from journeying through the area with the knowledge that they will have to negotiate difficult bends and contend with heavy construction traffic. The degree of attention required by drivers will turn what should be a leisurely trip into a stressful journey. Many will decide that it is better to look for other areas of recreation.

Therefore, my constituents have considerable interest in the area, but the MOD and other Government Departments seem content on keeping the community at arm's length. Witness the response to The Observer report about a possible melt-down on HMS Resolution in January this year. I do not propose to go into that argument again. However, it is worth pointing out that the answer given by the MOD was minimal and did nothing to alleviate the fears of the community. There is no doubt that a fuller answer could have been given without detriment to any security requirements. It seemed to be a knee-jerk reaction to media interest which betrayed a lack of any thought or recognition of the community's interest in the base. It may well be a characteristic of those involved in defence generally. Recently, when documents relating to the servicing of the United States submarines at the Holy Loch base were washed up on Helensburgh beach, the United States authorities dismissed the documents as being of no interest. That comment was at variance with those expressed by defence experts and revealed the US Navy's answer to be both callous and insulting to the community.

The matter that I wish to bring to the Minister's attention is one which raises questions of safety, as it revolves around the construction of the shiplift and finger jetty designed to lift Trident submarines out of the water. The company responsible for the £120 million contract is Cementation Construction, and it has run into considerable difficulties with tubular steel piles drifting out of tolerence during driving. Hammers have also been breaking down, and an underreaming drill used to form pile sockets in the granite seabed has been lost. Cementation has to drive a total of 1,040 tubular steel piles for a 15,000-tonne capacity submarine shiplift and twin berth jetty. In addition, two concrete cellular jetties extending 285m out into Gareloch and supported on 825 piles of varying diameter are required to be driven. It is extremely worrying that about 150 piles are thought to have been driven so far, and dozens are going beyond the specified 75 mm lateral tolerance, some more than another 75mm out.

The reasons for the difficulties have been investigated by those concerned for over four months, yet no agreement has been reached. It is considered by the project consultant engineers, Babtie Shaw and Morton, that boulders in the soft clay which lie up to 80ft deep above the rock are responsible for knocking the piles off course as they are driven from offshore jack-up barges. However, this is contested by the contractor, Cementation. It has called in a foundation specialist which has decided that the boulders are incidental and that the main problem lies with the unexpected joints and fractures in the bedrock.

The obvious question is: was a terrain survey carried out before the decision to go ahead with the project was taken? I assume that this must have happened. So why was the fault not discovered at the time, over 12 months ago? Who is at fault for the present situation? If a pre-construction survey had been competently carried out in the initial stages, the implication would be that the difficulties were due to the operational procedures now being undertaken. We know that in fact there is a debate over driving procedures between BSM and Cementation which was resolved by way of a compromise. The immediate question is whether the piles that are out of line could feasibly have been driven according to specification, or whether the overburden and bedrock qualify as unforeseen ground conditions. To remedy the problem will be extremely expensive and difficult, as some piles will have to be extracted and replaced, while others will be treated in situ.

I would like to put a number of questions to the Minister. I realise that the complex nature of the matter means that it may not be possible for the Minister to respond fully this evening. If that is the case, I request him to respond in full by writing to me as soon as possible. Has a conclusion been reached on the nature of the problem? Is it the terrain, and, if so, can the problem be overcome, or will the project have to be abandoned? After all, in a report to Parliament last year by Sir Gordon Downie, the Comptroller and Auditor General, the building works programme at the Clyde submarine base was identified as a "high risk area". What is meant by that phrase? Was a proper terrain survey carried out? If so, why was the fault not discovered? Who is responsible? How many piles will have to be replaced, and how many will be subjected to corrective measures whilst remaining in place?

The whole project was estimated to run for 162 weeks, until the summer of 1990. As more than four months have been spent in trying to identify the nature of the fault to no avail, presumably it will be impossible to predict accurately how much the Trident programme will be delayed by the setback. However, I should like to know how many weeks have been lost to date. The PSA refuses to comment. Why? This is not a matter of security, with grave implications. The PSA appears to feel that it has no responsibility towards the community, and does not need to communicate with them. There was an unofficial comment in the magazine New Civil Engineer from an unidentified individual at the base. This anonymous individual was quoted as saying that it was "anticipated that the overall contract would still be finished on time."

That does not correspond to what is known about the difficulties of identifying the nature of the fault and of rectifying it. It appears to be just another bland assurance that everything is all right and that the public need not bother to ask any questions. It corresponds with the press release in the Clyde public safety document which states that in the event of a release of radioactive material the media should state that "a small quantity" of radioactive material has been released, regardless of the real nature of the accident.

Because of those bland assurances and the unwillingness to communicate on issues that are not directly related to security, my constituents are losing confidence in any statements made by the Government Departments involved with the base. Yet the MOD, with the greatest number of public relations officers in any Whitehall Department, seems unconcerned. This matter should deeply concern the Minister.

The New Civil Engineer magazine refers to the cost of delay and the extra work, which, in its opinion, is currently a highly sensitive issue between Cementation and the Property Services Agency. It adds that, although details of the anticipated ground conditions are unclear, the PSA has confirmed that the Cementation contract has no condition for unforeseen ground. What is the additional cost of the remedial work and who will pay for it? Will it be Cementation or will it be the project consultants, Babtie Shaw & Morton? Will they be considered to have any liability? Will the taxpayer, through the Property Services Agency, finally have to foot the bill? The Ministry of Defence has always been very reassuring about the cost of Trident, yet those costs have escalated year by year. The public have the right to know the additional costs that will have to be borne if the PSA takes ultimate responsibility for this regrettable situation.

The nature of the problem must be discovered and made public. The cost of the remedial work must be estimated and, if the problem is due in any way to human error, whoever is responsible must be identified. Above all, safety must be the overriding consideration in any remedial work. That should be the case in all contracts covering work at nuclear submarine bases. Here, above all, there must be no temptation to cut corners.

I note that since this contract was issued in July last year a clause has been introduced that allows contractors to claim against the Government for additional costs that result from unforeseen circumstances. I welcome the inclusion of such a clause because it gives some guarantee that safety will not be prejudiced by consideration of costs. I hope that the Minister will take it upon himself to ensure that the safety of my constituents, including service personnel, will be the overriding criterion, no matter who bears the financial responsibility for the matter.

I realise that there are many interests of common concern between us in relation to the Clyde submarine base and its economic and social influence in the constituency. In that respect, I freely and graciously acknowledge the Minister's assistance and courtesy to me in the past, and presently in regard to surplus MOD housing in Helensburgh. However, I hope that he will realise that he needs to be as open as he can with the community I represent when difficulties arise at the base. He should give real reasons, not the bland placebos of the public relations men which the MOD all too often provides.

1.58 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) on raising this important issue. I am grateful to him for giving me general notice of the points he proposed to raise.

The Government's decision to replace Polaris in the mid-1990s so as to maintain an effective nuclear deterrent well into the next century continues to enjoy overwhelming public support, as does the decision to use the Trident II D5 missile system with all the advantages of commonality that it will give us in operating a system which is in use with the Americans. Our programme is proceeding satisfactorily and on schedule. An essential part of it is the development of the Clyde submarine base and the construction of new facilities to support the Trident strategic weapon system and Vanguard class submarines at Faslane and Coulport.

The hon. Gentleman raised a number of detailed questions and I shall try to answer as many of them as I can. I will study the record and write to him if I am unable to cover all the ground tonight.

Works at the Clyde submarine base amount to almost £660 million of Trident development. That is all taking place within the hon. Gentleman's constituency. The origin of the hon. Gentleman's specific interest may lie, as he has suggested, in an article in the technical journal, the New Civil Engineer, dated 28 April. That article, aimed at professional civil engineers, described in some considerable detail technical difficulties that need to be tackled and overcome in the course of the development. I shall come to these issues in a moment, but before commenting on them I remind the House of the nature of the development, and in particular the shiplift being built at Faslane.

The Clyde submarine base, which is already the base of the Polaris submarine force, was chosen as the main base for Trident because of its closeness to our primary NATO area of interest, because of its ready access to deep water operating and because it offers deep water berthing.

The Clyde and its approaches is the only site meeting all these requirements without the additional costs of providing additional facilities and new buildings elsewhere. The base, incorporating HMS Neptune at Faslane and the royal naval armament depot at Coulport, is a major home for the United Kingdom fleet, and the facilities being provided will support not only Trident but hunter-killer submarines into the next century. The base will also continue to support Polaris until the system is replaced.

The most important elements of this development programme are the creation of new facilities at Coulport for processing warheads and arming the submarines, including the construction of a floating explosives handling jetty, the development in the northern area of Faslane that will include a shiplift, a new jetty, support buildings and power generation facilities, and external works such as the network of new roads between Coulport and Faslane.

As a construction programme, this represents the largest and most complex project ever undertaken for the Ministry of Defence. Indeed, it is one of the biggest construction projects in the United Kingdom. Much of what we are building has to meet very exacting standards and criteria on nuclear safety, which the hon. Gentleman raised specifically. I am sure the House will realise that this represents a formidable challenge for the Property Services Agency and its contractors and consultants. I pay tribute to PSA, which acts as our agents in managing the project.

Part of this overall redevelopment includes two facilities being constructed by Cementation Construction Ltd. as the main contractor in the northern development area of Faslane, a finger jetty which will provide berths for submarines, and a shiplift to allow submarines to be serviced at short notice in dry conditions.

The concept of a shiplift is not novel. They are in increasingly common use throughout the world as a practical alternative to the more traditional facilities of dry docks, or floating docks. A shiplift consists of a platform which can be raised by a large number of winches—about 100 in the Faslane case—and can be used to lift vessels clear of the water. Our shiplift will be located within a large building and will provide a protected environment from the weather in which to service the submarines.

However, at Faslane there is a feature which adds considerably to the complexity of the technical task. This shiplift will be used to lift nuclear-powered vessels, and since safety must always be of paramount importance in all matters concerning nuclear reactors the shiplift, like many other facilities at Faslane, has to be constructed to the very highest standards required in the nuclear industry. That means that the structures themselves must be designed to remain sound, even in circumstances when a more conventional building would have failed, and, to use them as facilities for nuclear work, it is necessary to demonstrate to a body of independent nuclear experts who are separately advised by the safety and reliability directorate of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority that the buildings, and the equipment within them, will withstand an earthquake of a magnitude that might be expected to occur once in every 10,000 years in the United Kingdom. I am not aware that such an event has occurred in our recorded history. If such an earthquake did occur, most of the other buildings in the area would collapse, but the nuclear facilities would remain sound.

I emphasise this because of the great importance we attach to the safety of the design and because it lies at the root of the matters addressed in the article referred to by the hon. Gentleman. The article describes problems experienced by the contractor in driving the piles needed to support the shiplift and the finger jetty, with the result that his programme is running later than he had hoped. These piles are steel tubes, typically 2 to 3 ft. in diameter, 160 ft. long and they must be driven into the bedrock with their tops located within a very small tolerance of between 3 and 6 in. I am sure the House will understand that such tolerances are not easy to achieve, but, because of the stringent safety standards we require for all our nuclear facilities, these standards must be maintained and any correction must be carefully controlled and monitored. About a third of the piles are now in place and work is progressing steadily. Where the contractor finds that a pile is out of tolerance, this is withdrawn and replaced. Less than 10 per cent. of the piles have been affected and, although the withdrawal and replacement naturally slow up the contractor's rate of piling, it does nothing to imply there is a basic engineering flaw.

The New Civil Engineer article goes on to speculate on the reasons for these difficulties and itself admits that the causes are many and various, ranging from the presence of boulders located in the clay on top of the bedrock to variable sea bed conditions. However, the House should understand that all these possibilities are not really relevant to the final outcome. The designers of the structure fully expected that rock conditions would be variable, and so the design takes account of that. Once the piles are correctly placed, the structure that they support will be safe, irrespective of the underlying ground conditions.

The article points not to a serious engineering flaw but to a slippage of the contractor's planned programme. The House will recognise that in any major construction project there are innumerable sources of slippage and the contractor and the PSA continually adjust their efforts and resources to minimise the effects of slippages on final completion of the project. I can assure the House that there is provision in the programme for the construction of the shiplift to take account of these slippages. We believe that the piling will be completed satisfactorily and that the complete facility will be provided within the time scale required for the Trident and other submarine programmes at Faslane.

Clearly, the requirement to meet stringent nuclear safety criteria has caused some cost increase in the shiplift contract. This is currently being assessed, although overall costs for this package, which includes other support buildings, as well as the syncrolift and finger jetty which I have already mentioned, remain within budget.

I am aware, too, of local concerns about nuclear safety in general, both in the current operation of the base and in the future. The hon. Gentleman has raised the incident involving HMS Resolution on 16 January. The press allegations about near-disaster were quite erroneous and alarmist. For the benefit of the House, let me repeat there was an electrical malfunction which was dealt with by standard operating procedures; at no time was there any danger to the submarine's reactor, its crew or the public. I assure the House that, as a result of the close attention paid to safety in the design and operation of nuclear submarines, together with the high standards of training of Royal Naval personnel, the possibility of any nuclear reactor accident is extremely remote. Indeed, we have never had an accident to a Royal Naval submarine resulting in the release of radioactive material to the environment.

The construction programme elsewhere at Faslane is well under way. Advance works at Coulport are complete and work on the construction of the main facilities and jetty foreshore has commenced. The Property Services Agency has invited tenders for the floating explosives handling jetty. The network of new roads, including the Garelochhead bypass, the northern access road and the Glen Fruin road, have been completed bringing much needed relief to local communities and offering a substantial improvement to the general infrastructure in the area. I understand the hon. Gentleman's comments about the effect of all this development on tourism, both in the past and in the future, but I am sure that he agrees that the efforts of the Ministry of Defence, through the PSA, in improving the road infrastructure have brought great relief to Helensburgh and to through traffic in the area generally.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the Garelochhead bypass has been handed over as a public highway and the private northern access road which is open to the public will be a permanent benefit to the area. The opening of these roads was warmly welcomed by the communities. We have also made improvements to the public water supply to communities on the Rosneath peninsula.

Clearly the development of the Clyde submarine base represents a major investment in the region, and many opportunities have been provided for Scottish-based manufacturing and service companies which won some 80 per cent. of the advanced works business up to the end of 1987 valued at £135 million. Indeed, the two most recent contracts totalling £22 million went to the Scottish firms of A. Monk of Sterling and Norwest Holst of Lanarkshire.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment was able to tell the hon. Member in January that about 1,650 employees of contractors and consultants engaged full time on the development had addresses in Strathclyde region. The comparable figure for Dumbarton district is about 800. Further major contracts let recently are expected to create about 700 job opportunities at peak. As I have indicated to the House, more contracts will be let later this year, including one for the floating jetty at Coulport.

The hon. Member will know, too, that we have paid particular attention to the impact on the environment and to the views of local communities, which we have welcomed at various community briefing meetings. I can assure the House that we are proceeding in an orderly and responsible fashion, taking account wherever possible of the legitimate concerns of local people, local and regional authorities and consultative bodies, including the Royal Fine Art Commission for Scotland and the Countryside Commission for Scotland.

The steps that we have taken to minimise the impact of the development range from major landscaping, conservation work and tree planting to noise insulation and strict contractor compliance with various conditions, such as construction traffic routes and working noise. I have no doubt that the local communities accept the need for what we are doing and recognise the lasting benefits that it will bring and the substantial efforts that we are making to alleviate the temporary burden which such a vast construction project places upon them.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has reported already to the House, the programme for replacing Polaris with Trident is proceeding satisfactorily and on schedule. The House should be in no doubt that it remains the Government's clear conviction that the Trident programme continues to represent outstanding value for money and that no enhancement of conventional capacity could possibly be of equal deterrent value.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Companies (Extra-territorial Controls)

1. Ms. Walley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement about his policy towards the United States Government exerting extra-territorial controls over United Kingdom firms.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): We have asserted on many occasions our rejection of United States claims to extra-territorial jurisdiction which infringe on United Kingdom sovereignty.

Ms. Walley: I thank the Minister for his reply, but I should have liked a fuller explanation of the way in which he thinks that this policy will affect the £2 billion trade deficit in the information technology industry in the United Kingdom. Given the damaging effects that it is having on not only my constituents but on others thoughout the country, does he agree that the time is right to ensure that United States law does not apply here? Will he take steps to do something about it?

Mr. Speaker: Briefly, please.

Ms. Walley: Does the Minister agree with The Daily Telegraph that this amounts to "RAM-shackle protectionism"?

Mr. Clark: I do not think that it has any effect on the trade deficit, although I should be interested to hear any case that the hon. Lady could draw to my attention. The problem with the United States' extra-territorial claims is that they carry, latent within them, a threat to cut off supplies to United Kingdom manufacturers if they do not conform to certain requirements of the extra-territorial provisions. If anything, it could be argued loosely that it has a beneficial effect on our trade rather than otherwise.

Mr. Batiste: Does my hon. Friend agree that the right way forward in this complex matter is to strengthen COCOM? How does he propose to deal with the problem, particularly as post-1992 some members of the European Community will not be members of COCOM?

Mr. Clark: I do not entirely agree with my hon. Friend. If the opposite of strengthening is weakening, I would say that COCOM needs to be relaxed rather than strengthened. One of the problems with COCOM is that it is too comprehensive, pays little regard to obsolescence and the list of items included thereon is far too long.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Is not the Government's attitude towards the American Government over this matter spineless? British companies and individuals faced with prosecution under American law, which does not apply in the United Kingdom, are put in a difficult position. One of my constituents cannot leave the country for fear of threat of prosecution from the American Government, but the British Government are not prepared to do anything to refute the allegation or to support him.

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. There is no compulsion on British firms to accord with the provisions of the extra-territorial legislation in the United States. Any British company that wants to resist it will receive the fullest support of my Department.

Mr. Stott: Is the Minister aware that the equipment that is being caught by these regulations is not necessarily state of the art stuff? It is equipment that he and I use in our offices. He must be aware that a growing number of British companies must go through the rigmarale of filling in forms to satisfy the United States Department of Commerce, which is having an increasingly corrosive effect on relations between the United States and its allies. Is it not time that his Department did something more positive? I suggest that the Minister might consider using some of the provisions of the Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980 to signal to the United States that this country is not prepared to accept extra-territorial laws, which are affecting British companies and damaging British trade.

Mr. Clark: The British Government have made absolutely no concessions to the United States' extra-territorial provisions. If a British firm feels that its commercial interests are best served by acceding to the provisions, that is a matter for it. If it wishes to enlist our support in resisting them, we should be very glad to offer it. The United Kingdom does not accept the provisions and has always rejected them. The form filling to which the hon. Gentleman referred is in no sense a statutory obligation. It is purely a matter of convenience which some firms adopt to speed up their internal auditing processes.

Manufactured Goods

2. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the latest balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the first quarter of 1988 there was an estimated deficit on trade in manufacturers of £2·9 billion.

Mr. Canavan: When does the Minister expect the Government to get trade in manufactured goods back to the surplus that they inherited from the previous Labour Government?

Mr. Clark: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave him on 13 January. In case he has forgotten what it was, I recommended that he ask his constituents and, if he thought it advisable, that he reproach them——

Mr. Canavan: Answer the question.

Mr. Clark: —that he reproach them for their propensity to buy foreign imports——

Mr. Canavan: When do the Government hope to get back in surplus? Answer the question.

Mr. Clark: I shall answer the question at some length, because I attach importance to it.

Mr. Speaker: I do hope not.

Mr. Clark: I am divided between my wish to accede to your desire, Mr. Speaker, and the vociferous requests by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan).

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the balance could be in my favour today.

Mr. Clark: All sectors of finished manufactures are in equilibrium, except consumer goods.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend agree that two problems face manufacturing industries and the balance at present? First, it seems that the Government, for some unknown reason, wish to keep the pound higher than it conceivably should be, which is dangerous for manufacturing industry. Secondly, when there is a monopolies and mergers problem, which we all have in manufacturing industry, the Government must look to 1992 and not stop companies such as Cadbury and Rowntree, which may like to merge, when others are not stopped from approaching them. Do we not have to look at this as a matter of urgency, and not in some cosy, quiet way?

Mr. Clark: I have great respect for my hon. Friend's judgment, but I do not necessarily extend it to his judgment of so-called real exchange rate values. The three strongest manufacturing exporters in the world—Japan, Germany and Switzerland—have the three strongest currencies.

Mr. James Lamond: Why does the Minister not try to help resolve the dreadful balance of payments problem and save his own job at the same time by clamping down much more firmly on the unfair competition from Turkish yarn and textiles, which is beginning to threaten the fragile recovery of our textile industry and is already causing redundancies in textile firms in the north-west of England?

Mr. Clark: The industry, which is co-operating with my officials, is preparing an anti-dumping case. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to hear that the figures for the first quarter of this year show that imports of Turkish acrylic yarn are down by 75 per cent.

Sir John Farr: Is my hon. Friend aware that the other day one of the biggest hosiery manufacturers in Leicester equipped itself with Italian knitting machines? When purchases of that magnitude go abroad, does my hon. Friend look into the reason why, and if not, does he not think that in future large acquisitions of such foreign machinery should be monitored?

Mr. Clark: I do not find that objectionable. I regret that we do not make knitting machines in this country that are acceptable to the firm in my hon. Friend's constituency. As I told the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), we are in equilibrium on capital goods, exports and imports. If those machines are used to manufacture finished products that will be exported and sold, all the better, I say.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Roger Stott. Sorry, Mr. Austin Mitchell.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That shows the benefit of appearing on television so frequently.

Does the Minister realise that his complacent answer amounted to saying that we are in balance except for the deficit in manufactured trade? Does he not realise the horrendous effect of the 18 per cent. rise of the pound sterling in real terms since the end of 1986, which will be disastrous for manufacturing industry? To illustrate that, may I ask him whether, in his view, the deficit in manufactured trade—in the first quarter it was running at £11·5 billion per annum compared to a surplus in 1978 of £5·5 billion, updated to 1987 values, which is a turnaround of £17 billion in manufactured trade—represents a loss of 750,000 jobs, 1 million jobs or 1·25 million jobs?

Mr. Clark: The figures that I gave the hon. Gentleman are up to date. They are for the first quarter of this year, when the exchange rate factor applied in the manufacturing sector. The only sector in which we are in deficit is consumer goods.

Northern Region (Ministerial Visits)

3. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his recent visits to the northern region.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I have made two recent visits to the northern region. On 13 April I attended the first Action for Cities roadshow in Newcastle. This was well attended by local business men, who demonstrated their commitment to the regeneration of the inner cities by making many specific offers of assistance. On 15 April I visited Teesside and saw some very encouraging signs that the regional economy is steadily improving and that regional pride and self-confidence are returning.

Mr. Devlin: As unemployment in the assisted and intermediate areas of the region and in my constituency has fallen by 3 percentage points in the past 12 to 18 months, will my right hon. and learned Friend make a further statement on the industry in the region and the way in which it is picking up and creating jobs?

Mr. Clarke: At my hon. Friend's invitation, on 15 April I visited two successful companies in Stockton, and I cut the first sod of a factory site for a third company. I saw why the regional economy is improving. My hon. Friend might have added that job vacancies in the region doubled during 1987. The best survey of his local economy came from the Teesside chamber of commerce. It surveyed its members and discovered that 68 per cent. had increased sales in the first quarter of 1988, 62 per cent. reported increases in home orders, 45 per cent. had increased their work force compared with three months ago, 92 per cent. expect their work force to increase or stay the same in the next 12 months, 87 per cent expect to improve turnover in the next three months, and 84 per cent. expect to increase productivity. The Teesside economy is getting off its sick bed and becoming a healthy economy again.

Mr. Radice: On his trip to the northern region, was the Minister made aware of the critical shortage of factory space, especially of units over 10,000 sq ft? Will he tell the House what the Government are doing to rectify that critical shortage, which threatens to choke off the upswing in the northern economy about which he has been talking?

Mr. Clarke: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman finding a cause for gloom out of so much good news.

Mr. Radice: It is a serious problem.

Mr. Clarke: It is a serious problem, because there has been a rapid increase in the demand for new factory space by businesses that want to open in the North-east. The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that demand is now outstripping supply. He knows the provisions that we made to English Estates and the assisted areas across the country. The time is now ripe for the private sector to provide factory buildings in the north-east as well. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, with demand and the state of the local economy being so high, it is obvious that private sector development of factories in that region is about to burgeon as well.

Mr. Fallon: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the northern region depends heavily on foreign investment? It has more to lose than probably any other English region from political barriers being erected to commercially judged takeovers.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. The north-east has been found to be an attractive place to invest by the Japanese and by the first Korean investors, as well as by many European and American investors. Those foreign investors are welcome to put their money into the development of industry within these shores.

Mr. Cohen: Can the Minister confirm that the integrated operations development programmes submitted to his Department have been passed to the Commission in Brussels? To date, the local authorities which have submitted those programmes have not received any word from his Department. Can he inform the House of the scale and timetable of article 15 of the structural fund? What is his Department's position? The structural programmes are for three to five years, but, we believe, the article 15 money is for only one year.

Mr. Clarke: I believe that most of the integrated submissions have been made, but I shall let the hon. Gentleman know exactly which have now been made. No doubt he is most interested in the submission affecting his area. I know that the Birmingham submission has been made, and I believe that most of the others have also been made. With regard to article 15, we have accepted the local authority claims, but we are not taking a view. It is a matter between the local authorities and the Commission. Again, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman giving him the precise position on that.

Research and Development

4. Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what recent representations he has received on the United Kingdom's spending on research and development.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John Butcher): Ministers of this Department receive representations regularly on all aspects of Britain"s research and development activities, including spending, from a variety of interested individuals and organisations.

Mr. Darling: Why does this country spend the lowest proportion of GDP on research and development of all our major competitors? Will not our balance of payments continue to deteriorate unless something is done about that? What do the Government intend to do to ensure increased spending on research and development?

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Gentleman has raised two points. He referred to the performance and spending from the private sector and industry, and to the level of spending sponsored by public funds. I shall answer his questions very clearly. If we consider Government-funded research and development as a percentage of GDP in 1985, we find that the figure for the United Kingdom is 1·3 per cent. for France 1·5 per cent., for West Germany 1·1 per cent., for Japan at 0·5 per cent., and for the United States 1·3 per cent. We compare quite favourably with the middle ground of the leading industrial nations.

However, the hon. Gentleman has a point when he refers to the performance of our industry in matching its competitors in other parts of the world. We are significantly below the international average in that respect. Given that the private sector and industry are now making excellent profits, we should ensure that they are doing their job and increasing the proportion of spending on research and development.

Sir Ian Lloyd: My hon. Friend will be aware from the reports made by our science attaché in Washington that the United States has recently allocated $200 million to research into the human genome. What representations has my hon. Friend received from our scientific community on that subject? What importance do the Government attach to it, and how much are we proposing to spend on it?

Mr. Butcher: No representations on that subject have come to my office from our scientific community. I suspect that in the first instance those representations might go to another Department as the sponsoring Department. However, I shall examine the position to discover whether representations have been made to another Department and write to my hon. Friend.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister not aware that a paper on the support for the international project to map the human genome has been submitted to and considered by the advisory council on science and technology? Is there no liaison between Government Departments on these matters? Is he aware that it is a very important programme which has technological applications, and applications in the treatment of disease and perhaps, most important of all, in basic research? Will he confirm that there is no danger of funds being diverted from the basic research budget to make up the deficiencies in support for industrial research from the Minister's Department?

Mr. Butcher: As I explained very clearly, there are different sponsoring Departments for different types of research. In the final analysis, bids from different Departments will, of course, eventually go through to the advisory council on science and technology, and if they are of major importance they may go to a sub-committee chaired by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, which also considers those issues. Any major enabling technology or technique of that nature will receive the fullest consideration.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are making very slow progress today. I ask the House for brief questions and we will then receive shorter answers.

Business Support Services

5. Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress he has made in examining the possibilities of using outside agencies to deliver some of the business support services currently provided by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All the consultancy initiatives within the enterprise initiative are administered by outside agencies. Discussions are in hand with the chambers of commerce and other bodies about the delivery of some of the services to exporters. Good progress is being made.

Mr. Forth: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. Are there other encouraging signs that the process can be taken further and faster on the basis that advice provided by the private sector can be provided more effectively and flexibly? Will he confirm that the Department of Trade and Industry would receive much better value for taxpayers' money by spending it in that way rather than keeping work in-house?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend, and that is why the consultancy advice under the enterprise initiative will be given by private sector consultancies. I am glad to say that the number of applications for consultancies means that we are well on target for the 1,000 consultancies a month that we forecast in the White Paper in January. All that consultancy advice will be given by good quality specialists in their respective fields drawn from the private sector.

Mr. Cousins: Does the Minister accept the European Court of Auditors' criticism of the way in which his Department administers consultancy grants in the regions? Will he introduce competitive practices in consultancy and marketing grants to enable small firms to survive in the region against large national accountancy firms?

Mr. Clarke: The report from the European Court of Auditors, which I confess I have not yet studied, will refer to past consultancies which, no doubt, were made available under the business improvement scheme under the auspices of the European Community. No one has had any chance yet to audit the progress that we are making under the enterprise initiative scheme. We are seeking to ensure cost effectiveness, and I am sure that we are achieving that. The response from companies that are seeking consultancy shows that we are providing a service that is welcomed by industry.

Manufacturing Investment (West Midlands)

6. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the figures for manufacturing investment in the west midlands for the years 1983 and 1987.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins: Regional investment data for 1987 are not yet available. Net capital expenditure, at 1980 prices, by manufacturing industry in the west midlands in 1983 and 1986 was £489 million and £603 million respectively.

Mr. Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that those excellent figures show that the west midlands manufacturing industry has been enabled to increase its productivity by 7 per cent. last year, to increase market share and thereby to increase employment in the industry? Will he confirm that any further improvements in competitiveness depend crucially on further improvements in productivity, which depend on wage settlements reflecting increasing productivity, but not exceeding it?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend has made the case exactly.

Mr. Nellist: Is not the figure that really matters the assets per worker in factories in the west midlands, which is still at a historically low level in real terms, because companies in the west midlands prefer to take the wealth that workers create in short-term profits rather than invest for the future? Is that not the real reason why under this Government the west midlands and the rest of the country are becoming the warehouse of the world, instead of what used to be known as the workshop of the world?

Mr. Atkins: The west midlands is an extremely important part of Britain. Many of my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in the area will vouchsafe what we know to be true, which is that many of the workers in the west midlands are doing extremely well and tend to vote Conservative in greater numbers as a result of their prosperity.

Mr. Gould: Does the Minister recall that in a debate last week of great importance to investment in the west midlands I questioned the assertion of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that Rover had recorded record exports last year? Will the Minister ask his right hon. and learned Friend whether he has now confirmed, as my researchers have, that Rover's exports last year of 165,000 cars fell well short of the 200,000 that it exported in 1979? Will he now admit the error to the House and set the record straight?

Mr. Atkins: They were record exports in value, not volume.

CBI

7. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met the director general of the Confederation of British Industry; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My last meeting with the director general of the CBI was on 25 January. Our discussions on that occasion were mainly concerned with inner-city issues.

Mr. Oppenheim: Did my right hon. Friend have an opportunity to discuss with members of the CBI the latest issue of Fortune magazine? If so, did they notice the article entitled, "Britain is Back" about the British economic miracle? While there is no place for complacency, and though it may be that Fortune slightly overstated the case, is not that article further proof that the Government's industrial policies are working, and should not the Opposition accept that fact?

Mr. Clarke: I do not recall any opportunity to discuss the Fortune article, but passing reference may have been made to the praise that we received from the retiring Japanese ambassador about the British economic miracle. I agree with my hon. Friend that we must sustain our achievement, and the CBI takes an optimistic view of the future prospects of British industry in its latest survey. We must continue all the good work, which is now earning such praise from all around the world.

Mr. Salmond: Did the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster take the opportunity to explain to the director general of the CBI the developing mystery of United Kingdom competition policy, whereby takeover bids for companies with golden shares are not referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission but the minority holdings of companies without golden shares are referred to the MMC? Is it not the case that competition policy is such that only companies with headquarters in London are afforded any protection?

Mr. Clarke: If there is a certain amount of mystery about our competition policy, it is because not enough Members have read the document that we recently published on mergers policy. It clearly states the criteria that we think ought to be applied. We believe that one should look mainly at the effects of competition on the British economy in protecting the interests of the British consumer. There are also powers taking account of the wider public interest. All those matters are considered consistently and sensibly by the Government on the advice of the director general as well.

Mr. John Marshall: When my right hon. and learned Friend next meets the director general of the CBI, will he discuss the view, with which many of us are in sympathy, that if the United Kingdom is the only EEC country to allow hostile bids from outside its shores, there is a risk that we shall become a branch factory economy? Will my right hon. and learned Friend also discuss the view that there should be reciprocity in takeover bids between this country and Switzerland?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that we are not the only European country allowing bids from outside its shores. Within the European Community we are aiming for free movement of capital, from which I am sure the Community will benefit. As I explained in the exchanges on this subject yesterday, if there is no reciprocity between countries, that factor can be taken into account when considering whether to refer a bid to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. We are awaiting the director general's advice on the particular case which I know concerns my hon. Friend.

Mr. Blair: As the Minister referred to the White Paper on mergers policy, I may tell him that it stated:

> "As for the suggestion that the competition authorities are too parochial in their approach and should take a wider European or indeed global view of markets, the Government believe the criticism to be based on a misunderstanding."

Is that still the Government's view? If not, and if competition policy is changing, will the Minister ensure that any changes are first notified to the House and do not escape in dribs and drabs of ministerial speeches?

Mr. Clarke: The quotation that the hon. Gentleman gave is entirely accurate, but it deals with a separate point. There are many areas of manufacturing and service industry where, if one looks at the market, it is found to be an international market. In 1992 we shall be looking to a single market within the European Community, so one must consider the impact of competition within that new market. It would be a mistake to confine one's view to the United Kingdom market, which would lead one into examining too much of a microcosm of the whole picture.

Yesterday, the Opposition—or at least the hon. Gentleman—seemed to be taking an extremely parochial view. As I see it, their policy is that no foreigner should be encouraged to invest in this country and that no English man should be encouraged to invest abroad. That is completely out of date and untenable in modern economic conditions.

Sugar Confectionery

8. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what tariff is imposed by Japan on United Kingdom sugar confectionery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Japanese tariff on United Kingdom sugar confectionery is 35 per cent. We shall be pressing in the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations for it to be reduced. Meanwhile, we are taking appropriate opportunities to tell the Japanese Government that we regard the level of the duty as excessive.

Mr. Gregory: We hear increasingly from the Government Front Bench about the round of discussions, but when will my hon. Friend stop drinking saké with the Japanese ambassador and get to grips with the problem, so that we may enjoy free and fair trade? There should be an opportunity for United Kingdom sugar confectionery and other manufactured goods—particularly, Scotch whisky—to enter the Japanese market.

Mr. Clark: The level of tariffs raised by the Japanese is on average lower than that raised by the European Community. If I may mention chocolate without having to answer a question about Rowntree, I point out to my hon. Friend that the tariff on chocolate has been reduced from 20 to 10 per cent. Our exports of confectionery to Japan amount to more than £4 million per annum, whereas its exports of confectionery to Britain total only £52,000.

Mr. Henderson: Is the Minister aware that we may not be in a position to export any chocolate to Japan shortly unless action is quickly taken on the matters referred to yesterday? We were discussing the possibility of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of the Nestlé bid for Rowntree, and 42 per cent. of the company's shares were in foreign ownership by the end of the day. Is he also aware that Mr. Kenneth Dixon——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called the hon. Gentleman on this subject yesterday. This question is about Japan.

Mr. Clark: I do not see how any of the factors that the hon. Gentleman mentioned will inhibit our exports of chocolate to Japan, which last year amounted to £1·2 million.

National Transputer Support Centre

9. Mr. Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assistance he is giving to the national transputer support centre.

Mr. Butcher: The Sheffield transputer centre is one of six transputer centres supported by the joint Department of Trade and Industry/Science and Engineering Research Council initiative to encourage the wider use of transputers. It is run jointly by the University of Sheffield and the Sheffield City polytechnic. My Department has contributed £635,000 to the transputer initiative.

Mr. Knight: Does my hon. Friend accept that, because there is a clear benefit to industry, it should be prepared to support these activities and develop the transputer for the market? Does he agree that this is the direction in which we should be moving—a greater role for private sector support?

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend will have noticed that in my Department's White Paper and subsequent announcements in the enterprise initiative this is precisely the way in which we want expenditure to move. The closer one gets to the markets, the less need there is for public sector funding, and the converse also applies. We believe that at long last the age of the transputer has arrived. It is showing signs of being a great success and I believe that its incorporation in super-minis, in particular, will bring great benefits in market terms.

Leasing

11. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the value of the leasing industry in (a) 1987 and (b) 1986.

Mr. Atkins: The latest estimate of finance provided by the leasing industry in 1987 is £3·4 billion at 1980 prices. The corresponding amount in 1986 was £3·1 billion at 1980 prices.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Does my hon. Friend agree that that reply shows the contribution made to the United Kingdom economy by the service sector? Would it be true to say that the service sector in this country——

Mr. Tony Banks: Stop reading, Fergus.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is perfectly OK. The hon. Member is glancing at his notes.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Does my hon. Friend agree that the service sector contributes twice as much to the economy in output and three times as much in employment as the manufacturing sector?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend has stolen my thunder. He is quite right.

Internal Market

12. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what further plans his Department has to publicise the implications of the internal market to industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are already taking a number of measures to alert business to the single European market and the vital importance of preparing for it now. These include regional conferences, detailed literature, national advertising and a telephone hotline. The single market campaign will run until 1992, but we shall continually assess its exact form in the light of current needs.

Mr. Wallace: Is the Chancellor aware of the recent CBI survey in Scotland, which showed that 34 per cent. of companies did not even know about the introduction of the single market in 1992? What further steps does he propose to take in Scotland, bearing in mind the difficulties that the peripheral areas face in trading because of transport costs? Will he ensure that his Department puts a forceful case to the European Commission for continuing to make available European regional development fund moneys for the Highlands and Islands?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's first point helps make the case for this campaign. When we started in England we found a low level of awareness and understanding among British industry. Already, after the first few weeks of the campaign, there has been a substantial increase in awareness, with more businesses preparing themselves for what they have to do for the changes of 1992. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will mount a similar campaign there.

As for the hon. Gentleman's last point, I assure him that we shall be pressing that case on the European Commission and in our discussions in the Council of Ministers with other member countries.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that for Britain to get the maximum benefit from the internal market we need dynamic British companies? Will he ensure that countries that prevent British companies from making takeover bids are not allowed to launch predatory attacks from a safe base? We have accepted the principle of reciprocity in financial services. Should we not do the same for manufacturing industry? Would it not be a good start to refer the Rowntree bid?

Mr. Clarke: The single market will be of considerable benefit to all the economies of the EC. We are creating a large market of 320 million people, which will attract a lot of inward investment. One of Britain's main aims must be to attract a disproportionate share of that inward investment compared with other countries. That still leaves us looking at individual bids, as I said yesterday on the case raised by my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory). Whether a similar bid could be made in the country from which the investment comes is a relevant factor, but it is only one of the factors that have to be considered once we have the director general's advice.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Chancellor confirm that the reported growth in manufacturing exports to Europe in the last quarter of last year was based upon statistical distortions and that manufacturing exports over the past two quarters have been stagnant, if not, indeed, in decline, confirming that the Government's policies have done nothing to prepare British industry for the single market?

Mr. Clarke: I always treat trade figures with caution, not least because my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade is considerably more expert on them than I am. Certainly recent trade figures should be treated with caution, because the way in which they are compiled has been changed since the beginning of this year. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the proportion of British trade going into the EC has gone up from about 34 per cent. when we joined the Community to about 50 per cent. now. It is a most important market. It is a fast-growing market and British industry is now extremely competitive and well placed to take advantage of it.

Mr. Page: Will not our future success within the internal market in the EC depend on the establishment of standards? What steps is my right hon. and learned Friend taking to ensure that British standards are accepted and adopted within the EEC?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right to say that the question of common standards is a matter of the highest priority. As we move towards the completion of the single market we are making a strong input to ensure that British standards are properly acknowledged and are not simply replaced by those of our competitors. We are also seeking the support of British industry in all the detailed work that is required to ensure that acceptable standards are in place so that we can have a genuinely free market by 1992.

Mr. Gould: Is the Chancellor satisfied that high-volume babble from advertising men is enough to match the much more careful analysis being made by other Governments in conjunction with industry of where their strengths and weaknesses truly lie, and of what advantages and disadvantages they can expect from the internal market? Is there not a worrying sense of dé jà vu about all this? Did we not hear the same hype and complacency in the 1970s and was that not followed by a massive loss of market share to European rivals? Is not the only real difference that on that occasion Lord Stokes at least had enough confidence in his own commercial judgment, even though he turned out to be wrong, to pay for his own full-page advertisements?

Mr. Clarke: I recommend that the hon. Gentleman gets hold of the substantial amount of literature that accompanies our presentation so that he can inform himself better of what the Government are advising British industry on when it comes to the single market. I well remember the hon. Gentleman, when he represented a different constituency, being one of the foremost opponents of our ever entering the EC. I suspect that inwardly he has not changed his opinion since that time. I am surprised that the late Lord Stokes' judgment is called in aid of any of these industrial matters. I have been studying some of the Labour party's advertising campaigns of the 1970s—television campaigns and whole-page advertisements, with leading industrialists and trade unionists urging the country to support the Government in backing price freezes and wage restraints. The difference was that that Government were dreary, second-rate and boring, like their advertisements——

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Chancellor is making a speech.

Mr. Speaker: I rather agree. It does not appear to have much to do with the implications of the internal market.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: When my right hon. and learned Friend publicises the implications of the internal market for British industry, I hope that he will make clear the important need to be even more competitive, particularly in manufacturing industry. Is not one way of doing that, both before and after 1992, to ensure a better supply of professional engineers and engineering skills? That is the way forward, so that British firms can compete more effectively with industry overseas. After all, we are producing fewer professional engineers than the Japanese. What are we going to do about that?

Mr. Clarke: I can be brief on this occasion because I strongly agree with my hon. Friend both that we need to be competitive and that we shall find it difficult to remain competitive if we do not encourage the training of sufficient people in engineering skills of the right quality. We shall continue to give that matter close attention.

Economic Growth

13. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether his Department is planning any new initiatives to stimulate the economy in the regions outside the south-east.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department's recently announced enterprise initiative includes a range of measures which are designed to take into account the needs of the regions and inner cities. The services provided under the initiative will change over time, as the needs of business change.

Mr. Henderson: Will the Minister confirm that at his various breakfast meetings in the north and the south industrialists have told him of the important link between industrial development and housing provision? Will he make representations to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on the need to prevent further housing development in the green belt in the south, thus preventing further congestion of the south and helping the north?

Mr. Clarke: North-eastern Labour Members are ingenious. A moment ago the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) found gloom in the booming state of northern industry—or certainly its rapid expansion—but the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) now wants to change the subject to housing. It is certainly necessary to provide proper housing for the employees of industry in the north-east, and the proposals of my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning to revive the private sector and encourage private investment in rented accommodation will benefit the north-east as well as other parts of the country.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is not the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) right? Would not one way of stimulating the economy in regions outside the south-east be to pursue tougher planning policies on industrial, commercial and residential development in the south-east, so that employers looking for more labour would be encouraged to go to areas of high unemployment? Then, perhaps, the housebuilders might be encouraged to go with them.

Mr. Clarke: If I am to be fair, I might apply to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) the strictures that I applied to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North. The nub of my hon. Friend's question must be directed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. As a midlands Member of Parliament and an Industry Minister, I certainly have an interest in prosperity spreading northwards. The sheer pressure of economics—the cost of land and the difficulty of recruiting staff in the south—is helping to stimulate the expansion of the economy in the midlands, the north and the inner cities.

Mr. Eastham: The rest of the country obviously recognises the seriousness of the north-south divide. May I impress that on the Minister in relation to the Channel tunnel project? Will he at least ensure that some of the contractual work, such as the consequential heavy engineering, will go to Scotland, the north-east and the north-west?

Mr. Clarke: As I understand it, quite an amount of work from the Channel tunnel project is going to the assisted areas, although it is not for the Government to place that work. I believe that the economy of the north has a great deal to gain from the Channel tunnel and improved communications with the continent. The recent actions of the National Union of Seamen underline the need for the rapid completion of the Channel tunnel, and we all hope that it is being dug even more quickly while present events continue.

Rental and Leased Cars

14. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what were the total number of rental and leased cars in (a) 1987 and (b) 1986.

Mr. Atkins: Estimates by the British Vehicle Rental and Leasing Association suggest that the population of rental and leasing cars was more than a million in 1987, a substantial rise on the figure of 889,000 in 1986.

Mr. Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that that answer reflects the wider success of the car industry, which recorded an 8 per cent. growth in new car sales in the last financial year? Will he join me in congratulating fleet hire companies such as PHH in my constituency on their contribution to cost-effective vehicle use in British industry?

Mr. Atkins: I am delighted to associate myself with my hon. Friend's compliment to PHH. Firms such as PHH, which is one of the market leaders, are rightly well-regarded for the service that they provide and for their contribution to small and large company profitability. My hon. Friend is right in his assessment of the figures, they are yet another indication of the success of the Government's economic policies.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Minister aware that one or two of these cars are almost certainly rented or leased by employees at the Girvan factory of Rowntree-Mackintosh in my constituency? I share the view that the proposed takeover of that company should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. As so many hon. Members on both sides of the House are saying that, surely the Minister must be getting the message.

Mr. Atkins: I do not think that that has a lot to do with rental and leasing.

Financial Services Act

15. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received on the workings of the Financial Services Act.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department has received a large number of inquiries and comments about the Financial Services Act in the 18 months since Royal Assent.

Mr. McAvoy: I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he tell the House how many hundreds, if not thousands, of firms are operating under the Act with only interim authorisation? Given the recent scandal of EYAS Securities, which had to be prevented from trading only a few days after the Act came into operation, what steps is he taking to ensure that the consumer is properly protected?

Mr. Clarke: It is true that at the moment quite a number of firms are operating with provisional approval. However, even those that have interim authorisation will be subject to much more effective regulation than hitherto. They will be required to observe conduct of business rules which give better protection to investors than that currently available.

Mr. Robert Banks: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is highly regrettable that the Financial Services Act does not contain any provisions which would frustrate the attempt by a Swiss company to take over a company such as Rowntree, bearing in mind that the share structure of that company is such that the vital voting shares can be held only by those whom the company agrees can hold them, and that this would militate seriously against any company being able to take over Nestlé, which might by that time have swallowed up Rowntree? Is he aware, furthermore, that Rowntree is a very old company established in 1725 and is vital to the industry in York and the surrounding areas?

Mr. Clarke: By one means or another I am being subjected to a number of questions about the state of Swiss law. Personally, I do not approve of the state of Swiss law, and if I were Swiss I would improve it and make sure that Swiss management was exposed to the same commercial pressures as our own. The fact that it is not, as I have said, in some circumstances can be relevant when considering a merger application. However, we have to consider the wider public interest. I know of the concern in my hon. Friend's constituency in Yorkshire, and I can assure him that we will be confirming this as quickly as possible when we have the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Following the closure of IDB last year and Afcor Investments a week and a half ago —both events that I predicted last year would happen, as investors drew my attention to their loss of hundreds of thousands of pounds in over-the-counter shares—is it not quite clear that many fraudsters and swindlers operate in the over-the-counter market? Is it not about time that the Government intervened to protect the public by making the investor protection legislation work? People cannot continue losing money on that scale.

Mr. Clarke: I do not know whether that was another notable figure confessing to the use of soothsayers, but the hon. Gentleman was obviously very prescient if he gave that advice to his constituents. He is making a case for the provisions of the Financial Services Act, and I can assure him that they will provide much more stringent protection for the private investor in this country in future. Certainly we are determined to ensure that they do that.

Industry (Competitiveness)

17. Mr. Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what measures his Department is planning to improve the competitiveness of British industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Improving competitiveness is primarily a matter for industry itself. Through the enterprise initiative my Department already offers a comprehensive range of practical advice and assistance on which firms can draw. This will be revised from time to time as the needs of business change.

Mr. Turner: Is the Minister aware of the damage that the rising exchange rate can do to Britain's industrial competitiveness? As the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that he does not believe that the rate can be sustained, will the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster tell us when he thinks it will begin to fall? Will the Minister tell the House when he will support industry instead of the City speculators?

Mr. Clarke: I do not intend to make any predictions about future exchange rates, and I advise the hon. Gentleman to seek the no doubt expensive advice of those who study the currency markets, who might try to guide him. These matters are not completely under the control of the Finance Minister of any single country. We play our part in seeking to achieve reasonably stable exchange rates and to eliminate unnecessary speculative short-term changes, but in the end it is the markets that determine the level of exchange rates. It is up to British industry to respond by improving its competitiveness in the face of whatever pressures it faces in the market place.

Mr. Hayward: Will my right hon. and learned Friend disregard any strictures from the Opposition Benches about competitiveness, since the Opposition have the most heavily over-manned Front Bench that has ever been seen in this Chamber, to the extent that their own workers and slaves on the Back Benches cannot even make contributions?

Mr. Clarke: I think that it is the first manifestation of the new industrial strategy that this large Front Bench team is meant to be working on. No doubt it will wish to apply to British industry principles that are similar to the ones that it applied in the past.

Mr. Hoyle: How will the competitiveness of British industry be improved if Rowntree is taken over by Nestlé? Will the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster ensure that this matter is referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Clarke: I can make no more comments on this bid than I have made in the last two days. Heaven forbid that I should ever be repetitive in this Chamber, so the hon. Gentleman knows what I said to him yesterday. To expose the management of companies to all the competitive pressures of the market place, which include vulnerability to acquisition by those who believe that they can improve the performance of a company, helps to raise the performance of the economy as a whole. We have to determine whether that is the major factor in this case, where the public interest lies and whether there is any case for referring it to the MMC. We shall do this once we have received the advice of the director general upon it.

Mr. Hind: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, due to the success of the Government's policies, there is a shortage of factory space in the north of England? What efforts is he making with the private sector to encourage factory building, which is bound to increase, and thereby improve, the competitiveness of British industry?

Mr. Clarke: We have ensured that English Estates has more resources available to it this year to help the assisted areas. I agree with my hon. Friend that we are now looking to the private sector to meet that demand. One aspect of the improvement of the economy in the north-west is that rents for accommodation are likely to rise because more profitable firms can afford to pay higher rents. That, in turn, will stimulate further development. We must do everything that we can to encourage that development, and the Government will take whatever steps they can towards that end.

European Regional Development Fund

18. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects next to discuss matters relating to the structure of the European regional development fund with other European Community Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The next Foreign Affairs Council, on 24 and 25 May, which my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will attend, is due to discuss the Commission's proposal for a new framework regulation for all the Community's structural funds, with a view to its adoption.

We shall be concerned to ensure that the European regional development fund continues to make its important contribution to British regional development.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Minister for his reply. On 24 and 25 May, will he and his Department make every possible effort to ensure that the British Government's representatives at those meetings maintain the pressure that the Euro-MP, Winnie Ewing, the local authorities, the Highlands and Islands Development Board and parliamentary representatives in this House from the Highlands and Islands of Scotland have exerted over the past few months to ensure that our access to and eligibility for support from the ERDF, which is crucial to our part of the country, is retained?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman will know that recently I had the pleasure of receiving a delegation from the Highlands and Islands. I was pleased to be able to tell the delegation, as I can now tell the House, that I am happy to follow the lead taken by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland in supporting most strongly the Highlands and Isiands bid for its fair share of the ERDF. We shall continue to fight our corner as strongly as we can.

Mr. Cryer: In addition to safeguarding ERDF funds from the Common Market, when the Minister is in communication with the Common Market will he tell it that imports of yarn from Turkey are damaging areas in Yorkshire and Humberside, such as Bradford in my constituency, that they have caused the loss of jobs and short-time working in the textile spinning industry, and that the safeguard clause, which is a pretty weak one, negotiated by this Government should be brought into operation as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Atkins: If the hon. Gentleman had been here earlier this afternoon he would have heard my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade give a definitive answer about a reduction in Turkish yarn imports. Since the hon. Gentleman himself knows as much about the European Parliament as most, I suggest that he takes it up there as well.

South Africa

19. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the current level of British investment in South Africa.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on the level of United Kingdom direct investment in South Africa is derived from a triennial inquiry conducted by my Department. Based on the latest available results, the book value of United Kingdom direct investment in South Africa, including oil, banking and insurance, was £2,725 million at the end of 1984. Information on portfolio investment by country is not available.

Mr. Nellist: Is not the real figure three or four times that? Despite February's draconian banning of trade unions and other opposition forces, and despite the show trials of Moses Mayekiso, the head of the second largest trade union, and others in South Africa, is not the real reason why the Government refuse to take economic action against the apartheid regime the level of British investment there and the profits from South Africa for British firms, which make donations to the Tory party? Does that not mean more to the Minister and to the Government than the suffering of millions of black workers and their families in South Africa under the detestable regime?

Mr. Clark: I am glad to act as a foil to the hon. Gentleman for one of his favourite star turns in the House. I submit meekly to his familiar diatribe. Encouraging trade with and maintaining current investment already in South Africa will, we believe, help to protect the jobs of the majority of people in that country.

Later——

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It will have been within your hearing that in answer to a question the Minister for Trade referred to the so-called European Parliament. May I have your assurance that permission will not be given to Ministers to avoid accountability in this Parliament by referring to that useless talking shop in Strasbourg?

Mr. Speaker: I hear it described variously as the European Parliament or the European Assembly.

BILLS PRESENTED

[Bill 165.]

Horses, Ponies and Donkeys (No. 2) Bill

Mr. David Amess, supported by Sir Bernard Braine, Mr. David Alton, Mr. Gerald Bermingham, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Robin Corbett, Mr. Stan Crowther, Miss Janet Fookes, Mr. Harry Greenway, Mr. Ken Hargreaves, Mr. Greg Knight and Mr. Allan Roberts, presented a Bill to protect horses, ponies and donkeys against cruel tethering; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 13 May and to be printed. [Bill 166.]

Dock Labour (Amendment and Limitation)

3.32 pm

Mr. David Davis (Boothferry): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to limit the provision of rights of registered dockers under the Dock Labour Employment Scheme to the lifetime of those in current employment; to remove from the local and national dock labour boards their responsibilities for recruitment and discipline of registered dock workers, and to provide that, in the absence of a negotiated agreement between the Transport and General Workers Union and the port employers on other matters covered by the Dock Labour Scheme, the Dock Labour Scheme and all other related enactments shall cease with effect from 31st December 1992.

The proposed Bill has three aims. First, it is to stop any further entries in the dock labour register as members who are on the register retire or resign. Secondly, it is to strike out of the current dock legislation those items which cause the worst abuses, particularly on control of discipline and recruitment. Finally and most important, the Bill aims to create a timetable for both sides of the port industry to negotiate an end to the current practices which cripple the industry, and to give us a new industry by the critical date of 1992. In the event of a failure to achieve that, the Bill would lead to the abolition of the dock labour scheme.

The scheme deliberately puts a sword of Damocles over both sides. I shall explain later how there is already a sword of Damocles over dock employers. In that respect the Bill will encourage the development of some measures which Opposition Members have already asked for. On this part of the Bill I am indebted to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) for his ideas.

I can best deal with the problem of discipline by example. In a port on Humberside three years ago a docker was imprisoned, having been convicted of smuggling. When he came out of prison, he was reinstated. It was impossible to dismiss him despite the fact that he had been imprisoned for a criminal offence and that that offence was directly related to his work. That problem is replicated around the country, for example, in cases of theft and other offences. As a result, it is impossible to maintain discipline in the docks, as every docker knows, and, more important, as every customer knows, who then takes his trade elsewhere. The Bill will eliminate that problem.

There are a number of other sad practices that add to the costs of the docks. One of them is known as "bobbing" or, in my constituency port of Goole, as "welting". It is caused by the labour board instructing the docks as to how many people they can employ to do a certain job. The board always instructs too many so that, for example, a Swedish liner service out of Goole has 27 people allocated to it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House should give the hon. Gentleman a fair hearing and then we can proceed with the next debate, which is an important one.

Mr. Davis: Those 27 people are never all present. At most, there will be 18, so the customer pays for 30 per cent. of his work force who do not work. That practice must end as soon as possible.

"Ghosting" is the technique whereby dock workers are required to mark people who do not work in the docks. That applies even to non-existent jobs. For example, there is a new cement loading unit at Goole. When a cement ship comes in, the crew attaches a pipe and the ship is emptied automatically. Two dockers are required to "ghost" that process. The customer has to pay for two dockers to do nothing and who may not even be there.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): What about safety?

Mr. Davis: The only safety aspect is whether either one of the dockers falls into the dock.

The scheme increases the cost of the industry in competition with Europe. In Rotterdam and Amsterdam, the cost of loading and unloading ships is between £2·50 and £3·50 a tonne. In Britain, it is between £7·50 and £15 a tonne, three to five times as much. It is ludicrous to expect that that will not affect the pattern of trade. That is just the tip of the iceberg.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not in a ten-minute Bill. I have not heard anything so far that is out of order.

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not our convention to raise points of order during the moving of a ten-minute Bill, unless it is a matter of order that requires my urgent attention. I have not heard anything out of order.

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows our conventions. Ten-minute Bills are not interrupted unless a matter of order requires the attention of the Chair. I have not heard anything that requires my attention as a matter of order and, therefore, I cannot deal with it.

Mr. Madden: It is a matter of order.

Mr. Speaker: I asked the hon. Gentleman on a former occasion whether it was a matter of order for me and it turned out not to be. I shall not take it too well if that happens this time.

Mr. Madden: You, Mr. Speaker, will recall that during the moving of a ten-minute Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) I rose on a point of order and you accepted my point of order. On this occasion, the hon. Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) is, according to the Register of Members' Interests, a director of Tate and Lyle. I should have thought that, as that company has a direct interest in the docks and in shipping, it would have been appropriate for the hon. Gentleman to have made known his interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not necessary to mention an interest during a debate if it is in the Register of Members' Interests. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has a direct interest in the matter.

Mr. Davis: I am not aware of having any interest to declare in this matter. I shall shorten what I had intended to say to save time. The net effect of the scheme is the destruction of jobs in Britain. More important, it destroys jobs in the poorest and most difficult areas of Britain. Opposition Members claim that they represent such areas.

[Mr. Davis]

In 1992, the Single European Act will be implemented. Yesterday the European Commission published the Cecchini report, which said that between 1·75 million and 5 million new jobs would stem from that Act. Most of those jobs, which will be in Britain, should go to the north-east, the east coast ports, Yorkshire and Humberside and the east of Scotland. Hon. Members who represent those areas should concern themselves with that.

If our ports are competitive, the jobs will go to the areas I have mentioned, but if they are not one of three things will happen. First—and worse—jobs will not be created at all. Secondly, they may go to non-scheme ports such as Felixstowe. Thirdly, trade may be diverted through the Channel tunnel. None of those is in the interests of the north or the north-east.

I should like to quote what the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said during a Consolidated Fund debate on the dock labour scheme:

"Nothing in the world is sacrosanct. Of course there must be changes and developments, but surely we all want them to be reached on a proper, sensible and agreed basis . . . All the aspects can be negotiated."—[Official Report, 10 March 1988; Vol. 129, c. 596.]

I agree with those wise words. My Bill would allow scope for such negotiation. It would allow time for the industry to find its own solution. That time is limited, however, on both sides.

In April 1990, the European Commission's permission to our Government to subsidise compensation schemes runs out. There is no guarantee that that permission will be renewed. That means that dock employers will have, if they have their own interests at heart, to try to get a scheme sorted out by April 1990. There is pressure on them and on the dock unions.

The Bill would create a sword of Damocles and the right conditions for the negotiated outcome which some Opposition Members said that they wanted when we last debated this issue. If Opposition Members really believe that they stand for the interests of the unemployed, and not for vested interests and narrow factions, they will come into the Aye Lobby with us and will not follow the narrow factions into the No Lobby.

3.42 pm

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Loyden: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

This is another back-door attempt by Conservative Members to wreck the national dock labour scheme. This issue was last debated only on 10 March when the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) accused me of treating the House to a highly emotional history lesson. There will be a repeat performance today because my perception of the history is not the same as that of Conservative Members.

When I went to elementary school, I listened to a teacher who was showing us a map of the world and said, "All that pink is ours." A nine-year-old said, "If that is so, why is my dad unemployed and why am I in my bare feet?" All the glories of the empire and 1066 and the rest are meaningless. I learned my history from my experience and as a working-class person who worked in the transport industry and as a seaman. The hon. Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) lacks such credentials. I declare my interest as a member of the Transport and General Workers Union. I declare that interest readily. I act in the interests of those whom I represent.

Today, Mr. Speaker, you unveiled a bust of the late Ernie Bevin, who was once Foreign Secretary. I disagreed with him on a number of things. As the leader of the Transport and General Workers Union and the architect of the national dock labour scheme, however, I know that he is held in the greatest respect in the minds of dockers and working-class people. [Interruption.]

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Shut your mouth!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that we have a very important debate after this business in which many right hon. and hon. Members hope to take part. Perhaps the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) will get on with his speech.

The Conservative party intends to end the security and order that exists in the dock industry. Its consistent opposition to the National Dock Labour Board arises out of its opposition to any protection for workers, and it is part of the Government's continuing attack on the trade union movement and organised labour.

Conservative Members want to see a return to casual labour on the docks. They want us to go back to the pre-1940s when men assembled at the docks to find work but half of whom were sent home without it and without pay. Men worked at the docks into their 70s and 80s because there was no pension; therefore, they had to continue working to live. The misery and deprivation of dockers and their families is fully chronicled. It is disgraceful that Conservative Members should be trying to revert to the days of exploitation of dock workers. They want to end the system that was introduced by Ernie Bevin, which was endorsed by several reports, including that of the Shaw inquiry and the Devlin report in 1964. Devlin recognised that the order that had been established in the ports was beneficial to the industry.

Members of my union who work in non-scheme ports should see through the intentions of Conservative Members. They enjoy their standards and conditions of work because of the national dock labour scheme. Conservative Members, who from time to time praise the non-scheme ports, should speak the truth. They will attack dockers at Felixstowe and at the non-scheme ports if this safeguard is removed, which is the benchmark of the standards that are prevalent throughout the industry.

Hon. Members who want to honour Ernie Bevin—I doubt whether many Conservative Members will want to do so—should recognise what he did in the 1940s in transforming a cruel and inhumane industry into one that gave men dignity and decent standards of life. They should not vote for the Bill but enter the Lobby and vote against the treachery of the Conservative party.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19.

Opposition Day

[11th Allotted Day]

Seamen's Dispute

3.58 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House, noting that the National Union of Seamen is willing to accept binding arbitration and has agreed, subject to safety and reasonable crewing conditions, to accept the P & O proposals if phased over three years, well before the Channel Tunnel becomes operational in 1993, and taking account of the risk to safety for passengers as well as for seafarers from P & O proposals to cut crewing levels by 20 per cent., recruit untrained crews and introduce a fourteen hour shift day, calls upon the Government to use its influence to bring P & O to the negotiating table and to accept binding arbitration to obtain a settlement which will allow all seafarers affected by this dispute to return to work with justice, and to set up an independent inquiry into the impact of the Channel Tunnel on safety standards and the economics of ferry traffic.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Meacher: The Opposition have called for this debate—and I must state at the outset that we regret that the Government have not seen fit to hold this very important debate in their own time—because we believe that the dispute, which is now in its 14th week, can be resolved only by both sides getting back round the negotiating table. We believe that the maximum parliamentary and public pressure must now be exerted to bring that about.

The origins of the dispute date back to last year when P and O advised the National Union of Seamen that there was a need for rationalisation in Dover to help ferries compete with the Channel tunnel. The NUS accepted that from the start, and it still does. It made that acceptance clear at the meeting in Dover last October between the union's port committee and the P and O chairman, Sir Jeffrey Sterling.

At that meeting, undertakings were given that any rationalisation programme would be phased in over five years to coincide with the scheduled opening of the Channel tunnel in 1993. Only six weeks later, on 4 December, P and O demanded that £6 million and not a penny less should be slashed immediately from the annual wage bill of £35 million. That is a huge cut of 17 per cent.

The P and O proposals involved 400 redundancies plus a package of pay cuts, longer shifts and more days worked. On 2 February crews from all 11 ships of P and O European Ferries held secret ballots on the proposals and decided overwhelmingly that immediate application was not acceptable for safety and other reasons. P and O announced that the changes would be implemented on 4 March and the strike began.

The central point is that, although the proposals are oppressive—and the subsequent option B offered by the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service and the P and O red book are essentially variants on the same theme—the NUS has been and is now prepared to implement the proposals so long as they are phased in over a reasonable period to take account of safety factors.

At ACAS in March, the NUS said that it would agree to savings of £2 million a year for the next three years giving P and O all that it asked for and the changes could then be introduced steadily and safely. In fact, the NUS has gone even further. It has repeatedly made clear that it is willing to accept binding arbitration and it has been asking for that for 13 weeks. P and O has refused arbitration, rejected ACAS and vetoed negotiations which it broke off after Easter.

P and O has stated its reasons for that stance in its statement which I believe has been circulated to all hon. Members. I want to examine that case. First, P and O states:

"P and O European Ferries Dover makes a totally inadequate return on capital—less than 10 per cent.—and investment in new ships or even major refurbishment is impossible."

That seems to be a rather surprising statement when P and O reported to its shareholders that last year was a bumper year during which its profits nearly doubled to a record £275 million of which no less than £41 million came from passenger ships and ferries. It was such a good year that Sir Jeffrey Sterling felt justified in paying himself an extra £635 a week from that record profit level.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No. I want to make some progress and get into the case. I will give way later.

If that record figure of profit is not too bad, next year looks even more promising. City stockbrokers Phillips and Drew expect P and O profits to rise next year to £350 million, including £60 million from passenger ships and ferries. That is a 50 per cent. increase in profits in that area. That is hardly the picture of a company with its back to the wall fighting for commercial survival.

P and O also claims in its statement:

"The business faces many future challenges not least of which are the probable loss of duty free sales and the introduction of VAT on passenger tickets, fuel and shipstores in 1992 and the opening of the Channel Tunnel in 1993."

Even if duty-free sales were abolished in 1992 through the implementation of the Single European Act, such a proposal could be vetoed by just one member state.

The EEC Commissioner, Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis, has said that there is little prospect of duty-free sales being abolished. Even if they were abolished, P and O's competitors, Sealink, Sally Line, the short-haul airlines, the hovercraft services and even EuroTunnel, would all be equally affected. There would be no relative loss to P and O. The same argument applies to VAT on tickets, fuel and ships' stores. There is no evidence that that will be introduced. There is clearly no reason why P and O must have the proposals introduced immediately.

P and O also claims in its statement:

"Shore staff have been reduced and savings made in other shore costs. Parallel savings are required afloat and agreement with the officers has been reached. A similar agreement is necessary with the ratings."

That might seem to be a surprising requirement when, according to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, a British able seaman grade 1 is already now cheaper to employ than his French, Belgian, Danish, Norwegian, West German and Dutch counterparts. Only Greek, Spanish and Portugese seafarers earn less. P and O also claims that wages have risen by 24 per cent. over the past five years, as if that were too large a rise.

The NUS members have received an average annual increase of only 4·5 per cent. a year, which is less than the rate of inflation. Nevertheless, P and O now states that it wants the same agreement with ratings that it has already reached with the officers. I imagine that that may not be too difficult to achieve since NUS ratings must work 24 hour shifts, but officers are required to work only 12 hour shifts.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that seamen from other EEC countries work longer hours and that is why they are paid more?

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. I will spell out the hours worked in detail in a moment. British seafarers are paid less for working longer hours.

P and O also claims in its statement:

"The union has consistently failed to enter into any commitment to change outdated work practices."

Like the statement made by the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) a moment ago, the P and O statement is simply untrue. The union has given a commitment to change working practices. P and O has sought to give the impression that there will be a bonanza for seamen. P and O's full page newspaper advertisement, which I am sure that many hon. Members will have seen, refers to "our offer of between £11,000 and £17,000 per year with up to 243 days off."

That sounds pretty enticing. However, P and O neglects to say that only a tiny number of senior ratings and skilled craftsmen will earn anything like the top figure. P and O also somehow omits to point out what I should have thought was a very relevant point—that the salaries are for a working week of 72 hours.

The 243 days off also sounds very attractive, but is also equally misleading. A seafarer's working shift is twice as long as that of an industrial worker on shore. We must also consider the rest time. Even the allotted six hours of rest may be broken up into two or three different two or three-hour periods and they are punctuated by engine vibration, Tannoy announcements and by any emergency such as safety drills or sickness cover for which the seafarers remain on call.

Contrary to the impression given by P and O, a seaman is already at a considerable disadvantage compared with the average industrial worker in terms of working hours. The ordinary worker ashore spends an average of 42 hours a week at work and enjoys five weeks' annual holiday with weekends and bank holidays off. That is about 2,000 hours at work each year. Before the strike, the P and O ferry worker was working 93 24-hour shifts a year, which is over 2,200 hours a year. P and O is now proposing 122 24-hour shifts a year. That will be over 2,900 working hours a year, nearly 50 per cent. more time spent at work each year than the average industrial worker.

Another consequence of the proposed work system is that P and O seamen will be denied even two weeks' holiday with their families. The maximum period that could be spent ashore under the P and O proposals would be one week. The P and O offer—the company likes to call it an offer—far from being generous, is extremely harsh.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: The hon. Gentleman claims that seamen are being asked to work a large number of hours. What proportion of the 24-hour shifts are they asleep?

Mr. Meacher: The maximum time that is possible for sleep is about five and a half hours. That is the maximum from the time that the seamen leaves a shift until the time that he rises and prepares for the next shift. Anyone who has tried to sleep on board ship with clanking chains, Tannoy announcements and emergencies such as drunks on deck who have to be dealt with will know that it is possible to get only a very small amount of sleep. The hon. Gentleman is making my point. He is emphasising that the proposals are extremely dangerous because of the fatigue that they will generate.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that, when the Government inspectors were sent on 10 May to the Pride of Bruges to check it for safety, they found that there were six seamen short with the necessary marine evacuation escape system certificates. Such is the nature of the reduction in crew members. As a result, it was necessary to bring in six members of the catering staff so that the company could get away with it. The funds of the National Union of Seamen have been sequestrated in the face of that sort of action. It is people like Sterling who should be in court and sequestrated, not the NUS.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to make such a statement in this debate without declaring that he has an interest? The hon. Gentleman had a cut-price, grace-and-favour flat from the National Union of Seamen without even declaring it in the Register of Members' Interests. The hon. Gentleman makes himself out to be a seagreen incorruptible and yet he has not even bothered to declare that fact.

Mr. Meacher: What the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) has just said is untrue. If he believes that it is true, I suggest that he says it outside. On the other hand, what my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has said is exactly true. There are appalling consequences for safety to which I shall be referring. My hon. Friend referred to sequestration, and it is true that the NUS's assets have been removed from the union's control. If there were any justice in Thatcherite Britain, the assets of P and O would have been taken away to pay full compensation to the victims of the Herald of Free Enterprise disaster.

One other matter is referred to in the P and O statement with which I must deal. The passage reads:

"The Red Book is a revised and improved offer of the terms and conditions of employment of the ACAS proposal, incorporating certain changes requested by the union and offering an additional £400 per year per man on the Zeebrugge and Boulogne services."

"Offer" is certainly a curious word to use to describe a pay cut for some of up to £25 a week, with 28 days more to be worked each year for no extra money, no guarantee of proper rest periods at sea, no payment for excess hours and 459 redundancies.

It is claimed that there will be an extra payment of £400 a year on the Boulogne and Zeebrugge services. It is curious that P and O neglects to point out that seamen will have to work an extra 700 hours a year to earn that sum at precisely 57p an hour. I wonder how many Conservative Members would accept such an offer.

Both P and O and the Minister have made much of the claim that 60 per cent. of NUS members have accepted the new terms. If that is true, why is it that only two of P and O's 11-ship Channel fleet are now sailing?

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Intimidation.

Mr. Meacher: I know that the hon. Gentleman is obsessed with intimidation. The tactics of P and O, which are, "You either accept the red book terms or you are sacked", is a form of intimidation in most people's eyes.

To date, less than 12 per cent. of the NUS members are willing to work. Of those who returned the signed red book agreement, the majority wish now to claim redundancy money or had no intention of crossing a picket line. The NUS has sworn statements from no fewer than 260 members who have now retracted their earlier decision to return to work. Several of the original strike breakers have now rejoined the strike. There is no drift back to work. Instead there is a drift back to strike.

The NUS will not and cannot accept immediate implementation of the P and O red book because there are real safety risks involved in the proposals. P and O's recruitment of untrained staff, the reduction of crewing levels by 20 per cent. and the introduction of an 18-hour shift all put at risk passenger safety only 14 months after the Herald of Free Enterprise went down last year.

Under the P and O proposals, if the Herald of Free Enterprise were to sail tonight from Zeebrugge to return to Dover, it would have a crew of only 65 officers and ratings. That would be 15 fewer than on that fateful night last year. Each of the fewer crew members would be required to work substantially longer and more tiring shifts.

It is not only the NUS and the Labour party that are deeply concerned about safety aspects. At the annual P and O shareholders' meeting last week, a shareholder commented on the Herald of Free Enterprise tragedy being dismissed in one or two lines in the annual report. He said:

"I hang my head in shame as a shareholder."

Shareholders should be even more ashamed by the revelation of a Kent constabulary report that during the aftermath of the Zeebrugge tragedy Mr. Peter Ford, the P and O European Ferries chairman, tried to persuade the police to use company figures that showed a higher number of survivors.

Nor is the Secretary of State blameless. Last week he said:

"There have been general inspections of ships and their equipment, carried out in Rotterdam by Department of Transport surveyors. Emergency procedure drills were conducted before the ships left Rotterdam".—[Official Report, 5 May 1988; Vol. 132, c. 1016.]

The Secretary of State did not say that those inspections were concerned only with the structural seaworthiness of the ferries and with whether officers and crews possessed the requisite qualifications. The hours which crews are required to work are a fundamental determinant of maritime safety, but they are not regulated by the Department of Trade.

I go further. The Government's amendment to our motion states, among other things, that:

"stringent safety inspections have been carried out by Department of Transport surveyors on the P & O ferries 'Pride of Bruges' and 'Pride of Kent', covering not only the vessels themselves and their equipment, but also the manning arrangements and the training of the crew."

I shall put that statement to the test. Today, I have been given by officers and able seamen a number of examples that I shall pass on to the House. The Department of Transport inspector passed the Pride of Bruges as being fit to sail at the end of last month, even though the forward draught marks were not visible. Those marks are a key safety standard and are vital in checking a ship's stability and its angle in the water. In their absence, stability is checked, I understand, by shoving a stick down the side of the ship.

Only a few weeks after the Pride of Bruges was inspected, a motor-driven lifeboat was launched to give the new crew some experience of lifeboat procedure. It broke down. The lifeboat crew radioed the ship and the other motor-driven lifeboat—and there was only one other—was sent to rescue them. That, too, broke down.

The Government have made specific reference to manning. I ask the Secretary of State to comment on this matter. Although all crew members have a vital life-saving role to play in the event of an emergency, I am informed that on 24 January the P and O vessel the Pride of Dover sailed from Calais to Dover 15 per cent. down on its basic catering staff manning levels despite an almost full capacity passenger load.

I am advised also, as one of the many other examples which have reached my office in the past few days, that bosun Frank Franklin signed off sick from the Pride of Free Enterprise—[Interruption.] I suggest that hon. Members listen to these important details. Bosun Frank Franklin signed off sick on 4 March 1987 and he was not replaced. He left the company officially and permanently on 20 may 1987 and was not replaced. On 17 June last year, the muster sheets still listed Frank Franklin as a crew member. That is one of many examples.

Anyone who examines the muster sheets will see that they regularly record people who have been off sick for six or eight months registered as crew members. Indeed, when the NUS met P and O's accountant and managing director at the end of February to examine the fleet's wage bill, it was found that one person who was on long-term secondment and another who was dead were both listed as crew members.

My final examples concern health and safety, for which the Secretary of State has specific responsibility. I know of a case of the deck crew responsible for chaining down the wagons on the car decks complaining last year about exhaust fumes. As nothing was done, they started to wear breathing masks to protect themselves. They were told by P and O to stop wearing the masks because it would alarm the passengers. I am advised also that one reason why crews are sometimes a little slow in closing bow doors—the significance of which will not be lost on anyone—is so that they may enjoy a little more fresh air, and yet the company has still not accepted an NUS request for air conditioning.

Last year, on the Pride of Free Enterprise—which has been renamed the Pride of Bruges—the hydraulic system for closing the inner doors broke down. It was not fixed for two months, until the ship went for a refit. In the meantime, the only way of closing the bow doors was to use block and tackle. Those examples completely belie the complacent and self-satisfied statements to be found in the Government's amendment.

If all the necessary safety inspections had been carried out, how is it that the "Brass Tacks" television programme broadcast a week ago found that the Pride of Bruges—a sister ship of the Herald of Free Enterprise—frequently broke safety rules? Why did it operate last August bank holiday between Dover and Calais with insufficient seamen to man the back-up fire-fighting team? What would have happened if a fire had broken out in those circumstances? Why do ships still sail when indicator lights on the bridge designed to inform officers when the bow and stern doors are closed frequently malfunction? Why do officers continue to finish shifts over-fatigued, and why were some officers on that television programme frightened to reveal their identities before the camera when discussing the company's safety record?

I come to my first example. If the Secretary of State is so satisfied with his safety inspections, why is it that, according to information I have been given today, which I shall pass on to him, the P and O vessel Viking Venturer sailed from Falmouth to Portsmouth last Sunday night with seven blackleg, unregistered crew who had been recruited via a travel agent in Falmouth which is not licensed to supply labour—breaking all the ship safety rules? It was a shareholder who at the P and O meeting quoted a sentence from the report of Mr. Justice Sheen's inquiry following the Zeebrugge disaster which I shall repeat:

"From top to bottom the body corporate"

—he was referring to P and O European Ferries—

"was infected with the disease of sloppiness."

Even that sloppy Townsend Thoresen management, as it then was, rejected as being unsafe working conditions similar to those which P and O is now trying to enforce. In Townsend Thoresen's submissions to ACAS in January 1986, during a previous dispute with the NUS, it stated:

"Extended hours of work of this magnitude without rest would compromise the safety of the ship and its passengers and crew."

Those were the words of Townsend Thoresen's management two years ago. If that was true two years ago, why is it not true today?

As to the crucial issue of safety, there are two central questions which the Government have always ducked but which the Secretary of State must answer this afternoon. First, why is it that, after the wholesale indictment of the Sheen inquiry on ship safety, P and O has never been prosecuted over its responsibility for the Zeebrugge disaster? It has not even been required to undertake a fundamental redesign of its unsafe, pre-1980 ferries. Secondly, why is it also, if market forces are pushing the ferry companies into choosing between secure business and passenger safety, that the Government will not set up a full inquiry into the economic impact of the Channel tunnel on ferry safety standards? I hope that the Minister will be able to erase suspicion that the Government's reluctance to act on both counts might just have something to do with P and O's contribution of £100,000 last year to Tory party funds.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Norman Fowler): Will the hon. Gentleman remind the House who is the treasurer of the Labour party?

Mr. Meacher: The treasurer of the Labour party, as the Secretary of State knows very well, is the general secretary of the NUS, Mr. Sam McCluskie. The difference between the relationship of Sam McCluskie with the Labour party and that of Sir Jeffrey Sterling with the Conservative party is that Sir Jeffrey has had a huge pay-off in lack of prosecutions and lack of any investigation into the safety of his ships.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman has just made a serious allegation. Is he prepared to repeat it outside the House?

Mr. Meacher: The Secretary of State—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] The Secretary of State made an ugly innuendo about Mr. Sam McCluskie. I made a statement about what, to the great majority of impartial observers, would appear to be the relationship between Sir Jeffrey Sterling and the Conservative party. If I am wrong about that relationship and about the fact that there has been no prosecution of P and O for Zeebrugge and no investigation into the safety of P and O ships, and about all the evidence that has been produced today, and if the Secretary of State can give me a convincing and unequivocal statement to that effect, I shall gladly withdraw.

There can be no more classic illustration than this strike of the irrelevance of the Government's anti-union legislation and the damage it has done in preventing the resolution of disputes. The sacking of 2,000 seamen at Dover in the course of an industrial dispute, using a power given to employers nowhere in western Europe apart from in Thatcherite Britain, has not solved the dispute; it has aggravated it. The secondary action law, based on the sham that the issue with P and O is entirely unrelated to the issue with Sealink, when Sealink had made it clear that it would implement the same proposals as P and O, has not solved and cannot solve the dispute; it has aggravated it. Sequestration has not solved and will not resolve the dispute. It has merely opened the way to an uncontrollable rash of unofficial disputes, and it has also aggravated the original underlying issues of the dispute.

If ever there was a need for a Government committed to negotiation rather than confrontation it is now. The sole responsibility for this continuing dispute lies with the intransigence and unreasonableness of P and O. If the Government now wash their hands, Pontius Pilate-like, of their links with P and O and of their responsibilities for safety, they will have shown beyond all doubt that they are much more concerned with union breaking than with the industrial welfare of this country.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will have heard the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) several minutes ago refer to the fact—I see he has snuck out of the Chamber——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): The hon. Gentleman waited until he had gone out.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Member for Amber Valley said that I was speaking on behalf of the seamen because I had been living at a flat owned by that union. He said that it was possibly a subsidised or grace-and-favour flat.

I want to place on record the fact that at no time while I was living at that abode was the flat anything other than regulated by the laws of the land—by the rent officer in the appropriate district. Never at any time was the flat subsidised by the NUS. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to do now what you would do if such a remark happened to have been made by an Opposition Member, and I ask you to demand that the remarks be withdrawn the moment the hon. Gentleman reappears in the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The hon. Gentleman has made his point. We must now get on with the debate.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the point of order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that this is a very short debate and many hon. Members wish to speak.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a short and important debate, but the aspersions cast on my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) must be dealt with. It is up to you to protect the integrity of the House and to demand that the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) withdraw his allegations.

4.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'noting that Government policies have established a sound and stable legal framework for the conduct of industrial relations which has significantly reduced the incidence and impact of disputes; that the National Union of Seamen has rejected various proposals for resolving this dispute; that stringent safety inspections have been carried out by Department of Transport surveyors on the P & O ferries 'Pride of Bruges' and 'Pride of Kent', covering not only the vessels themselves and their equipment, but also the manning arrangements and the training of the crew; believes that the resolution of industrial disputes must be a matter for the parties concerned operating within the law and within their economic circumstances; and condemns acts of intimidation and unlawful secondary action designed to resolve industrial disputes by means outside the law.'.

We have just heard a large number of charges and allegations about safety from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). He made a nasty little speech, adding unsubstantiated allegation to unsubstantiated allegation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will deal in detail with points that the hon. Gentleman made about the Department of Transport and together we shall try to show that the allegations are simply untrue. We shall also investigate the new allegations made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West, and make public our findings on them.

The hon. Gentleman's first allegation was that Government surveyors found that the crew were short of six certificated persons to operate the marine escape system. I am told that that is untrue and that the surveyor found that there were more than enough certificated persons on board both ships.

We have also heard the charge that the Government's policy is unduly influenced by the interests of P and O. We shall take what the hon. Gentleman said later in his speech as a complete withdrawal of the nasty allegation he made at one stage. The general allegation is also untrue. I found it extraordinary that he should accuse anyone of partiality given that he has shown his own independence by appearing on the picket line of the NUS. We know exactly where his orders come from. In this dispute he is acting as a spokesman of the NUS.

Most significantly, we have heard almost nothing about the unlawful secondary action of the NUS, which has been the root cause of much of the trouble. We have heard little or nothing about its effect on companies such as Sealink and on the free movement of passengers and freight. We have heard little or nothing about the two days of talks at the TUC, in which the NUS shop stewards once again refused to call off their secondary action. We have heard nothing about the Labour party's position on the NUS refusal to observe the law of the land.

The reason why the Government introduced legislation on secondary action was to prevent industrial action from being used as a weapon against those who are not directly involved with the company in dispute. The Government's action has been confirmed by two general elections. In any test of public opinion there is no doubt that the measures that we have taken are supported by the vast majority of the British public. The Labour party promises to scrap that law. That is only one more reason why it will remain firmly anchored to the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I am sure that the House is grateful for the history lesson, but the House, the public and the seamen want to know whether the Government are prepared to intervene to try to bring the dispute to an end.

Mr. Fowler: I am covering that precise point.

We want to know from the Opposition their position on secondary action which is now causing vast difficulty throughout the country.

Mr. Allen: What are the Government going to do about it?

Mr. Fowler: What is beyond doubt is that measures on secondary action—

Mr. Allen: What are the Government going to do about it?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman must stop being so pompous. He cannot duck his responsibilities, or those of the Labour party, by such mindless chanting.

The NUS has the right to seek to change the law. There is no question about that. The hon. Member for Oldham, West has the right to promise to change the law. But it must be recognised that no one has the right to refuse to observe the law as it stands. I hope that the hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) rose——

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda) rose——

Mr. Fowler: No, I shall not give way for the moment.

I hope that the hon. Member for Oldham, West will now make it clear that he accepts the law and that he will advise the NUS to lift its unlawful secondary action. I challenge the hon. Gentleman to make the Labour party's position clear.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South) rose——

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Fowler: I shall not give way.

I challenge the hon. Member for Oldham, West to condemn secondary action in Britain.

Mr. Cryer rose——

Mr. Fowler: The House and the country will draw their own conclusion.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that it does this House no good to have more than one hon. Member standing in his place during the debate?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Member for Oldham, West——

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Fowler: No, I shall not give way.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West shows a cringing indifference to the welfare of the British public. The fact is this. Nothing obliged Mr. McCluskie to lead his union into conflict with the law. What has brought the NUS to its present crisis is an obstinate determination to seize, by unlawful means if necessary, what it failed to obtain at the negotiating table.

The law on secondary action is there to protect those who are not involved in a dispute, including companies, from having gratuitous loss or damage inflicted upon them. I must repeat that it is entirely right that such companies should be protected against the reckless and indiscriminate action of a frustrated union.

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Fowler: No, I shall not give way.

Nor can it be argued that the NUS has in any sense been caught unawares. The basic injunction banning unlawful secondary action was granted on 1 February, and sequestration was first applied for on 11 February. The union has known for three months precisely what legal risks it was running, and the instructions given to its bank to move its funds showed that it understood the implications of the sequestration imposed on other unions in the past. It has deliberately chosen to disobey the law and it is suffering the penalties which the law provides. It is impossible not to share the views of the judge in the case who said:

"The National Union of Seamen has been flagrantly, repeatedly and gravely in breach of the injunction granted by this court . . . Members and their leaders have only themselves to blame. This is the clearest possible case of deliberate, attempted suicide."

Mr. Rogers: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: No, I shall not give way.

The Opposition's motion advances a number of bogus——

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not persist. The Secretary of State has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Fowler: The Opposition's motion advances a number of bogus arguments, and none is more bogus than the allegations on safety. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will deal at greater length with those matters later, but certain fundamental points have to be made at the outset.

First, safety is an absolute statutory duty. It is an offence to sail boats which are unsafe through undermanning. Moreover, watch-keeping arrangements must be adequate to avoid fatigue. All allegations are investigated and, I repeat, any new allegations will be investigated and offenders will be liable to prosecution.

Secondly, the two ferries plying between Dover and Zeebrugge, the Pride of Kent and the Pride of Bruges, have been exhaustively inspected—not only the vessels themselves and their equipment, but the manning and training of the crew. They must be the most inspected ferries ever to operate from British ports.

Thirdly, it is wholly false to say that P and O operates or proposes to operate with untrained crews. All crews, whatever their tasks, are given training both ashore and on board about their duties in ensuring the safety of passengers in all circumstances.

Fourthly, the suggestion that the P and O proposals involve undermanning which endangers passenger safety is also false. Crew members may be reduced, but essential safety duties governed by Department of Transport standards are covered.

I repeat for the third time that all allegations, including those made months after the event—some of the allegations of the hon. Member for Oldham, West go back to last year—are being and will be investigated. But we all know that safety is not at the heart of this dispute. It is a smokescreen. Indeed, Mr. McCluskie has said time and again that the dispute is not about the substance of the P and O proposals but about their phasing in. He accepts the new arrangements, but questions their timing. That surely gives the lie to the whole safety argument mounted by the Opposition.

The Opposition ask the Government to use their influence to bring P and O to the negotiating table I should remind the House that P and O was at the negotiating table for several months; that it made significant relaxations to its original proposals; that it lifted deadlines on two or three occasions to allow further time for negotiations; that it participated fully in ACAS conciliation activities from mid-March, and that since the beginning of February those negotiations were conducted under the duress of a strike at Dover.

It was not until all those processes had been exhausted and three months of strike endured that P and O put its final—again improved—offer direct to its employees at Dover. The NUS did not put that offer to the membership —there was no secret ballot on that—but sought further concessions. However, more than 1,000 P and O staff accepted the terms and the company was able to restart ferry operations from Dover.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): Why does not the Secretary of State recommend that P and O goes to arbitration? As the NUS has accepted, the dispute has gone through a category of developments and we now want that final development; we want the dispute to go to arbitration. Why does not the Secretary of State recommend that?

Mr. Fowler: If the right hon. Gentleman will wait a few minutes, I shall come to precisely that point.

The Government's view—it is one to which the Labour party usually subscribes when in government—is that disputes should be settled by the parties within the law. Even if that were not the position, there is no case whatever, against the background that I have set out, for the Government seeking to intervene as the Opposition suggest.

The Opposition's motion moves from a reference to the negotiating table to binding arbitration, to which the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) referred. There is an important difference between negotiation and arbitration. In negotiation both parties are able to protect what they consider to be their fundamental interests. No doubt the NUS and P and O did that throughout the prolonged negotiations leading up to the company's letter to its employees on 14 April.

Arbitration takes away that protection and hands over judgment on vital commercial matters to outsiders with no stake whatever in the success or failure of the company. [Interruption.] If they want to go to ACAS, there is no problem. Sometimes people are prepared to hand that judgment over, either on an ad hoc basis or as the final stage of an agreed procedure. But the decision whether to do so must remain a matter for the parties, in the light of their own circumstances. It is not a matter for the Government.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The Secretary of State knows that I was party to some of the discussions, at the invitation of the union and Sir Jeffrey. The dispute was about how the £6 million was made up and how much could be saved. There is a genuine dispute between the NUS and P and O about how the figures were arrived at, although I shall not go into the details now. The NUS said, "Let us go to independent arbitration on the question of the figures. If your figures are right, we shall accept them, but if our interpretation is right, we will not." We are talking not about all the commercial details but about how the figure of £6 million is arrived at. That is the simple issue, but Sir Jeffrey does not want anybody going over any of his figures or subjecting them to discussion.

Mr. Fowler: I know of the hon. Gentleman's interest in and knowledge of this subject. If people are prepared to go to arbitration at some stage, that is a matter for them; it is a decision for the parties concerned. [Interruption.] It must be. There is nothing new in what I am saying. That principle was applied by Labour Ministers, too.

The motion also calls for an independent inquiry into the impact of the Channel tunnel on the economics of ferry traffic. There cannot be many people who want yet another inquiry into the Channel tunnel. The history of the Channel tunnel is a history of inquiries. Labour Members are trying to go back to another age in industrial relations. They must recognise that the tunnel is now being built; the decision has been made. It is up to everyone concerned to make decisions accordingly.

One aspect of the dispute that has received too little attention is the fact that it is handing business on a plate to foreign-manned vessels. Surely we all want an effective and competitive British ferry industry. That is not being achieved by the actions in the dispute, which has caused disruption at the ports, now added to by the actions of the lorry drivers. It has caused hardship and inconvenience to the travelling public and financial loss to companies and members of the NUS. Regrettably and indefensibly, it has also given rise to examples of intimidation and arrest. To date, there have been some 103 reported cases of intimidation, threatening phone calls and daubing of houses and about 17 arrests. That should be condemned by both sides of the House.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what he intends to do about the lorry blockade—not by union members but by individuals? What laws apply to those individuals and how does he propose to deal with that situation?

Mr. Fowler: As the hon. Gentleman knows, talks are going on at the moment between Sealink and the harbour board and the lorry drivers affected. If we have further news, we shall convey it to the House as soon as we can.

The Government's role is threefold. First, we must ensure the safety of vessels. I entirely accept that, as does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. Secondly, we must ensure that public order is maintained. Thirdly, we must provide a framework of law in which disputes can be resolved.

We should also be clear where the rights of the public lie in cases such as this. First, there is a right to work without being harassed, intimidated, assaulted or threatened. Secondly, people have a right to make up their own minds whether to strike or cross a picket line. Thirdly, workers have a right to decide whether to sign a contract. Fourthly, everyone has a right to unimpeded access to the ports. There is no right to spread a strike to companies unconnected with the central dispute. There is no right to stop fellow workers going to work or to use force where persuasion has failed. Finally, there is no right to pick and choose which laws to obey. That is why I ask the House to reject the motion.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It will be evident to the House that a very large number of hon. Members on both sides wish to speak in this short debate, so I appeal for short contributions.

4.57 pm

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): I am a new Member of the House, and a major cause of frustration is that in my short time here I have repeatedly seen the Government duck their responsibilities. I thought that we had sunk as low as we could yesterday when the Prime Minister attempted to foist responsibility for the housing benefit cuts on to local authorities, but what we have just heard from the Secretary of State for Employment boggles the mind. He is attempting to deny responsibility—the responsibility of this Government and his predecessors—for changes in industrial relations law which have meant that an industrial dispute no longer starts with negotiation and with the parties round the table. The Government have removed any encouragement to adopt that course. Instead, we have immediate recourse to the courts and to dismissal notices. It is no wonder that the strike has spread across the country.

Regardless of the laws that the Secretary of State attempted to state, in the full knowledge that the Secretary of State for Transport is blind to the safety laws that the country demands, there must come a time——

Mr. Rogers: Selective recognition of the law.

Mr. Doran: It is selective recognition, as my hon. Friend says.

I am worried about the effects that the dispute is having on my constituency. I represent part of the city of Aberdeen, which has a substantial seafaring community. In my constituency there are more than 4,000 registered members of the National Union of Seamen. As far as I am aware, they are all involved in the dispute. There are also a large number of interests that are quite separate from the dispute. The dispute, which started in Dover and which seems to be about the balance sheet of P and O rather than about anything else, is having an effect on the ferry service to the northern islands and has disrupted supplies to the North sea oil industry.

On Monday I travelled to London to come to the House on the same train as a full-time officer of the National Union of Seamen, Mr. Harry Bygate, who is based in Aberdeen. We spent most of the journey looking through the various writs that had been served upon him. He has now received 18 writs from 18 separate supply companies based in Aberdeen and in other parts of the country. Every one of those writs tells its own story. Every one of those writs means that industrial relations in those companies have been disrupted.

I make no apologies for repeating that P and O, Sealink and every other employer now feels that there is no option but to bring the courts into the dispute at the earliest possible stage, as that provides a major strategic advantage. Negotiation has gone out of the window. There is no incentive for an employer to negotiate, whether that employer is at the heart of the dispute, as P and O is, or whether it is a simple, one-man operation attempting to send vital supplies to the North sea industry. Employers now go to the courts.

The Government, by avoiding their responsibility to the wider interests of this country, are ignoring the serious implications for the future. I must express my disappointment that the Secretary of State simply thumped the table, referred to the various statutes for which the Government have been responsible, and ignored the effect of that law on the wider community. The Government make apologies for their own supporters, the chairman and the board of P and O, but ignore the rest of the country. That raises very serious questions.

I shall give the House one example of the way in which P and O has conducted the dispute. The ferry link from Aberdeen to Shetland is vital, as it carries essential goods and provisions to the islands. The National Union of Seamen is very conscious of the effect that any industrial dispute would have on the service to the islands. Last year it negotiated with the Shetland Islands council an agreement to ensure that essential supplies to the island would be maintained. One ferry per week would be allowed to leave from Aberdeen carrying essential supplies.

As soon as the dispute began, the Shetland Islands council was contacted. The NUS agreed that it would allow that one ferry to go and that the wages of the staff would be paid direct to charity. None of the NUS members would receive any payment. They would work voluntarily to ensure that that vital link to the islands was preserved.

P and O was contacted and asked whether it would allow the profits for that trip to be paid to the nominated charity or to a charity of its choice. The NUS was prepared to leave the choice of charity to the Shetland Islands council. The response from P and O was, "No. We want our profits." The whole dispute is about profit. Nothing from P and O, and nothing from the Government, has suggested anything else.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The hon. Gentleman has illustrated the position clearly. Undoubtedly, the shipments to Shetland are very welcome indeed. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in my constituency there is considerable sympathy for NUS members, and considerable scepticism about P and O's case? Will he explain why the case against P and O is jeopardised when secondary action is taken against, for example, the one-man operation in Aberdeen that supplies the North sea oil rigs? Does he not think that that muddies the waters and does not allow the focus to be on the real dispute with P and O?

Mr. Doran: I was coming to that. The hon. Gentleman is quite right to point out that the dispute is with P and O. I am trying to make the point that the dispute has not spread because of secondary action by the NUS, which in my constituency has made its position fairly clear. It stated in court this morning that the action that was taken had nothing to do with the P and O dispute, but occurred because the union's funds were sequestrated. The NUS members have come out because their union has been attacked.

Clearly, the Minister and P and O do not understand the affection in which the union is held. Recently, I was proud to attend the one hundredth anniversary of the NUS in Aberdeen. It was a very moving occasion, when representatives of the city from all walks of life paid tribute to the work of the union.

I have no hesitation in saying that the city of Aberdeen supports the dispute. Last week there was a benefit concert for the NUS which more than 1,300 people attended. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) has reminded me that I should point out that the district council election in Aberdeen was held two days after that concert, and the Labour party took back control.

There is huge support for the National Union of Seamen, and the Government's failure to become involved in the dispute, and the cavalier way in which the Secretary of State dismissed the pressure that the Government could bring to bear on P and O to return to the negotiating table, to allow arbitration and have the claims of both sides independently and objectively tested, show that the Government care nothing for industrial relations. They are concerned for their friends and for profits, and for nothing else. The interests of the British people, the North sea oil industry and industrial relations throughout the merchant shipping industry mean nothing to the Government. They are concerned only with profit and with their friends, and they should be castigated for that.

5.6 pm

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) made a fair point on the extent to which the strike has spread, but he has failed to answer his own question about who is responsible for it.

Let us be absolutely clear that this is not a general industrial dispute between the ship owners, as represented by the British Shipping Federation, and the National Union of Seamen. Nor is it an industrial dispute involving ferries in general. Those who know the industry reasonably well will recognise that the whole method by which ferries are operated is completely different from the method by which deep sea ships are operated. The way of life for the crews concerned is entirely different.

There could be a case for saying that, given the challenge of the Channel tunnel, there might be grounds for a general dispute between crew members, the unions involved and the owners. However, that is not the case. It is an absolutely specific dispute between P and O, European Ferries (Dover) Ltd., and the National Union of Seamen. It does not involve the other ferry companies. Indeed, Sealink, the main competitor to P and O Ferries, has made it very clear that there is no dispute between it and the NUS. It is worth reminding ourselves that P and O Ferries is no longer a member of the British Shipping Federation. Hence the National Maritime Board is not, and cannot be, involved in the current dispute.

Therefore, the dispute does not of itself raise the issue of how seamen in general are employed, how the terms of their employment are settled, which trade union should represent them, or, indeed, whether they should be members of a trade union. Nor does it raise the wider issue of what is loosely called the closed shop at sea.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Does the hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of shipping, agree that the fact that the funds have been sequestrated means that the dispute has spread to the deep sea merchant seamen because they will not allow their union to be attacked in that way?

Sir David Price: The dispute is not about that. I am trying to help the House by attempting to define precisely what the dispute is about.

It therefore follows that any industrial action taken against other shipping companies than P and O must, by definition, be illegal secondary action and must be condemned. That appears to be the view of the courts and that is what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment confirmed. Consequently I raise the inappropriateness—that is the most modest word that I can use—of the action taken by the National Union of Seamen against Sealink.

Apart from Sealink not being in dispute with the union, it has offered to take on, perhaps only on a temporary basis, some of the seamen who are redundant because of the action taken by P and O. I can think of no less constructive way of attempting to solve the dispute than the action that the NUS has taken against Sealink. I have no personal interest to declare in Sealink. I am looking at the matter objectively. Are the Opposition really able to support some of the wilder demonstrations involving secondary picketing in a dispute that should be confined to P and O Ferries? On many occasions my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) has referred in the House to incidents that do not help to resolve the dispute.

Sealink appears to be on a hiding to nothing. So are the poor old lorry drivers. They have every reason to be angry, but they seem to be completely disregarded by all the parties to the dispute. A number of long-distance lorry drivers live in my constituency. Many other hon. Members will share that experience. Lorry drivers are greatly affected by the dispute. They are the victims of a dispute over which they have no control and to which they are not parties. P and O and the National Union of Seamen ought to think carefully about what is happening to lorry drivers.

Reason and good sense will prevail only when secondary action, with all its consequent overtones, is called off. The dispute is between the National Union of Seamen and P and O. Nobody else is directly involved. My oft-repeated view is that the Floor of the House of Commons is not the right place to attempt to resolve an industrial dispute; nor is it right to attempt to resolve it on television. The speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and the interventions of hon. Members on both sides of the House support my view.

Where should we look for a resolution of the dispute? There are two classic ways to resolve it—by arbitration or by conciliation. Hon. Members know that they are not the same. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to that distinction and I believe that all hon. Members agreed with him. In theory, both arbitration and conciliation remain available, but both options require the active participation of both parties. To use an old saying,

"It takes two to tango."

If one party to the dispute is not prepared to participate, there is little that one can do about it.

P and O has said that the time has passed for such approaches and that it has made new arrangements with half its work force. Some may say that P and O should be more co-operative, but as half its work force has accepted the so-called red book offer, P and O argues that it does not need to reopen negotiations with the National Union of Seamen. Where necessary, it is recruiting new employees on the basis of the red book offer. In those circumstances, I do not believe that hon. Members have a legal or a moral locus in the dispute other than in the important area of safety, specifically relating to crew manning and crew qualifications. I shall leave it at that until my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport addresses the House.

Mr. Rogers: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir David Price: No. I want to make only a short speech because many other hon. Members wish to take part in the debate.

I am using this occasion to offer my personal advice to Jeffrey Sterling and Sam McCluskie. When I was a manager in industry, I was very much involved in many areas of industrial relations that were said to be sensitive, but we never lost an hour, let alone a day or a week, of work through an industrial dispute. I understand fairly well the trade union movement. My first boss, a large, 17-stone Glaswegian engineer, said to me once:

"David, it's often our duty in life to stand on our colleagues' feet, but always resist the temptation to push them down in public."

5.16 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The speech of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) was certainly more reasoned in tone than that of the earlier contributions. At the risk of losing any friends that I may have in the House, I must say that the Front Bench speeches displayed the unacceptable faces of both the Labour and the Conservative parties. It became a straight shouting match. Both sides were selective over the facts that they chose to use to promote their arguments. It is important that the facts should be considered in the round.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh referred to secondary picketing. It is not just a legal question. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) has laid himself open to criticism. Sequestration took place because of secondary picketing. I am not sure that in law it is a defence to say that the subsequent extension of secondary picketing was due to sequestration. Leaving aside the law, secondary picketing seems to me to be a very unwise tactic for the NUS to adopt. The dispute is between the NUS and P and O. To target Sealink is extraordinary because Sealink is a potentially useful ally of the union.

I do not understand why the NUS cannot see that the best way to defeat P and O is for it to have a successful competitor that can offer additional services. If it were successful, it would keep P and O ships in port and out of operation. That would provide the NUS with a much better chance of pressing its dispute to a successful conclusion. At the least, it would ensure that conciliation and arbitration were used.

I should have liked the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to urge the Dover port committee to listen to the advice of Sam McCluskie. He should have asked for the secondary picketing to be called off and for all attention to be concentrated on the union's dispute with P and O. It is regrettable that the Secretary of State for Employment failed to condemn the intransigence of the P and O management. P and O is clearly intent on becoming a non-union company. It is possibly even paving the way for becoming a non-British company.

In the last two days Government spokesmen have referred to the right of trade unions in Poland freely to organise and pursue their legitimate ends, but quite different speeches have been made by Ministers in the context of the legitimate actions of unions in this country. The P and O management is exploiting a weak union and the law, and it is doing so in such a way as to raise a number of serious questions.

There is evidence that at the meeting of P and O shareholders last week the management did not have the support of all its shareholders. Members will have seen the article in The Guardian which said:

"the company was accused of intimidating the workforce, being used as the militant wing of the Conservative party and neglecting safety. The chairman, Sir Jeffrey Sterling, was urged to resign unless he went back to the negotiating table and was even accused of doing more moonlighting than some of the employees he had criticised."

Those criticisms were made by shareholders of the company, but their attempt to raise the issue was ruled out of order. Victor Keegan, the author of The Guardian article, asked the pertinent question; should there not have been a secret ballot of the shareholders to find out whether that view had significant support? The point that I am making is that shareholders in P and O are less than happy about the conduct of its management and its intransigence. That is an interesting and relevant development.

Even more to the point, the Secretary of State seemed to imply that he did not see a role for arbitration in resolving disputes. He seemed to suggest that that method of resolving disputes should not apply in this case or in future. When there is intransigence and inability to resolve a dispute, conciliation and arbitration are necessary. It would have been a welcome move if the Secretary of State had at least taken the opportunity to encourage the management to take account of that.

The safety issues that have been raised have been dismissed in a cavalier manner. Representations made to me show that there is real public concern. For the Government to be so offhand when the tragic memory of the Zeebrugge disaster is so fresh in people's minds is alarming. The management of P and O is seeking to ensure that its crews work much longer hours and on a smaller staffing ratio. It has already been made clear that if the new arrangements had been in operation, the Herald of Free Enterprise would have sailed with 15 fewer crew and staff and that they would have been more overworked and more tired than they were at the time of the disaster.

That suggests that there should be independent regulation of staffing methods rather than that being left to the commercial judgment of a management which has already been shown to be severely flawed. In these circumstances, the Government have not given the assurances that would inspire public confidence that they put safety above commercial interest and profit. It seems that they have not learnt the lesson of the Zeebrugge tragedy. The public would have expected the Minister to demonstrate that the Government had done so.

I support free enterprise enthusiastically, but it should be fair. The crucial difference between the approach of my party and that of the Government is that fairness is not of interest to the Government, either in the operation of the market or in the balance between management and employees in the operation of companies. It is extraordinary that the Government do not believe that they have any locus or responsibility in the matter.

It would be helpful if the Labour Front Bench would urge the Dover committee to accept the advice of Sam McCluskie to call off secondary picketing and concentrate on the dispute with P and O, and if the Secretary of State for Transport put pressure on the P and O management to recognise that a negotiated settlement is in everyone's interest if British-owned ferries are to have a constructive future in the strategic interest of ensuring that, as an island nation, we have safe, well-operated, efficient and consumer-satisfying ferry services operating across the Channel.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me in this important debate which concerns my constituency. As always on matters concerning his constituency, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) is in his place on the Bench beside me. He has followed events closely throughout the dispute. He has been deeply concerned about the intimidation and other threats in his constituency because of the dispute.

As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the conventions of the House prevent my hon. and learned Friend from taking part in the debate, but both he and I wish to thank first and foremost the police who have had a very difficult task throughout the dispute. I visited the police station in Dover to get a briefing on the position. Many policemen have been involved, not just from Kent but from other counties. They have had to work long hours. When missiles were thrown in one incident which started at 1.30 am, policemen who had gone off duty at 11 pm had to be called back. We should not forget that policewomen are also carrying out police duties on the picket lines, and we must thank them as well.

I also wish to pay tribute to all those, striking or not, who work in the ferry industry in Dover and Folkestone. Some 6,000 people work directly in the industry and many more are involved indirectly. About two thirds of them are not involved in the dispute and they want to get on with their jobs. Over the last 30 years the ferry industry in Dover and Folkestone has expanded considerably. Sadly, there have been quite a few strikes; 1985 was a bad year when there were five strikes. Consequently, profitability has been low. Figures supplied by the trade union research unit at Ruskin college, Oxford, show that the profits of P and O today are less than they were 10 years ago. These are the trade unions' own figures. I have them here for any hon. Member who wishes to inspect them.

[Mr. David Shaw]

The changes that will be required in the ferry industry are severe and deep. The Channel tunnel is fundamental to those changes. Also, in 1992 the removal of duty-free goods and Customs barriers will necessitate changes in the ferry industry. Indeed, the trade union research unit report said:

"There can be little argument concerning the need to rationalise the present ferry operations to compete with the tunnel."

The dispute is a tragedy for the working people of Dover and for the shopkeepers and the small business men of Dover and Deal. It is also a tragedy for the lorry drivers whose frustration has resulted in their queueing on the M20. It is a tragedy for people all over the country who have been affected by it. My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) has brought to my attention the fact that in her constituency a small transport firm is threatened with being put out of business. Eight families are heavily involved.

Since the strike began I have had considerable contact with all parties in the dispute, including members of the National Union of Seamen and of the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers. As well as speaking to union officials and company representatives, I have talked to shopkeepers, freight companies and others affected by the dispute. There is no question but that many trade unionists were sensible and moderate. Early in the dispute many told me that they did not like the original blue book terms issued by the company in December. Some of the officers thought that those terms were difficult for the crews to operate.

I put those points to P and O which was at ACAS at the time, undergoing the advisory, conciliation and arbitration procedures. ACAS suggested new terms. P and O took on board the points that had been put to me and those put by ACAS. After three months of negotiations and arbitration, the company produced new terms known as the red book. The union then rejected those terms without explaining them to its members.

Mr. Prescott: The members rejected them.

Mr. Shaw: The union rejected them. I shall come to that point in a moment.

The union members raised a number of concerns with me and I am sure that hon. Members will not object if I detain them with some of the detailed points. They wanted to know how long the red book terms would last. I put that point to the company which said that it envisaged that they would last at least two years. That was a reasonable request from reasonable trade unionists who were worried that the terms might be renegotiated in six months.

The union members wanted to know why the basic pay was below National Maritime Board rates, so I put that point to the company. The company explained to me that the rates of pay were between £11,000 and £17,000, of which many people in this country would be envious. However, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) failed to mention that not only is that basic rate of pay payable, but that there is in addition a cash profit-sharing scheme and a shares profit-sharing scheme.

When I put those points to the union members, they asked how the profit-sharing scheme worked. They said that they were not aware of a cash profit-sharing scheme. They said that the union officials had not told them about that scheme. I therefore asked the company how it worked, as any logical and sensible person would do. The company told me that, in North Sea Ferries, part of P and O, where a successful profit-sharing scheme is in operation, it can mean another 30 pay days per year if the company is successful. That is in addition to the shares profit-sharing schemes.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Is my hon. Friend aware that those incentives were not available to ordinary seamen when I was a member of the National Union of Seamen and an employee of P and O in 1965?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend makes a good and valid point. When I go on to mention some of the other terms and conditions, I expect that his mouth will water and that he will wonder why he left shipping and came to the House of Commons.

Many of the men were concerned about the rest periods, just as many hon. Members would be concerned. Is it true, as the Labour party has said in its statements, that men can be required to work for 18 hours non-stop? Of course it is not true. They have 10 hours off and six hours off for sleep are guaranteed, except in emergencies. Out of a 24-hour period, the normal working period would be 14 hours, but that 14-hour period would be broken up by meal breaks and by a sleep break. [Interruption.] The men have meal breaks, just as anyone else does.

I discovered that there were other points that the union officials had not explained to their members. Trade union officials told me that the red book redundancies were worse than the blue book redundancies. When I put that point to the company, it said that there were 100 fewer redundancies under the red book terms than there had been under the blue book terms. It is no wonder that there is a strike when the union officials do not properly explain the contracts to their members.

Mr. Prescott: The points mentioned by the hon. Gentleman were spelt out in the document given to the company and distributed to every member who voted on it. In one case, where the members wanted to vote, the owners instructed the courts to intervene to stop the NUS conducting a secret ballot.

Mr. Shaw: I shall deal with the ballot procedures in a moment. Those procedures are very interesting.

At my meeting with the union officials and members, I asked how they would decide whether to accept the new terms, including the good pay and other favourable aspects. They told me that there would be a car park meeting. I asked why they had decided to hold such a meeting. That question was also asked by others, so it was not a case of a Tory MP creating political bias. There were 20 union members—about half of those present at the meeting in Dover—who said that they wanted a secret ballot, although the union insisted on a car park meeting.

Mr. Prescott: The courts stopped them.

Mr. Shaw: No, they did not. I received anonymous phone calls at home, asking why the union would not give its members their dignity by allowing a secret ballot. Then I discovered a letter from the union, dated 22 January, telling its members that there would be a secret ballot. The union proposed a postal ballot to its membership. According to an article in The Times of 6 May, the letter stated:

"the outcome of negotiations with the company on new work rotas would be 'placed before the fleet by way of a postal ballot and you alone will decide whether to accept or reject the offer'."

Why did the union not do that? The headline of the letters page of my local newspaper the East Kent Mercury asked: "Why wasn't there a secret ballot?"

That is what a seaman's wife who wrote to the paper wants to know. She said:

"Nothing has been said of the fact that there was not a secret ballot at the start of this strike and that at all the open meetings, where there was a show of hands, many of the people there were not even employees of P and O."

Mr. Allen: Read us another one.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman wants another letter. The Dover Express has another letter for him. Unfortunately, the writer of that letter was too terrified to give details of his or her name and address, but the newspaper is prepared to supply the name and address, if necessary. It asked:

"Isn't it time the union held a secret ballot for its Dover members?"

Those are the letters of ordinary men and women who work on the ferries. Those people want a secret ballot. Hon. Members will wonder what happened in those car park meetings in Dover. Was the 30-page contract discussed? Were all the terms and conditions discussed? Were the £17,000-a-year salaries discussed? I accept that those salaries are at the top of the range, but were the £11,000 to £17,000 salaries discussed? The details were not discussed.

The motion, which I heard myself, was, "Do you think that the company should go back and negotiate more?" One might just as well ask a man whether he has stopped beating his wife. Obviously, if one asks people whether the company should go back and negotiate further, they will say yes, especially in an open meeting surrounded by many people who do not even appear to be employees of P and O. It was a disgraceful meeting in the car park. There should have been a secret ballot.

Mr. Prescott: Why?

Mr. Shaw: There should have been a secret ballot because the hon. Gentleman, who is a member of the NUS, said:

"My trade union actively ballots, in most cases by way of postal ballot, on matters concerning strikes, the election of officials, the political fund—the political fund will now be governed by legislation—and various other matters. In other words, ballots are an integral part of my union.—[Official Report, 23 April 1985; Vol. 77, c. 777.]

Why no secret ballot then?

Mr. Prescott: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that he has presented no evidence to support the charges that he is making. It is written in all our union books, and has been for a long time, that we have secret ballots. The newspaper quotation that the hon. Gentleman gave confirms the union's policy. We have ballots at the outcome of negotiations.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman has got to do it. If he wants it, let him have it. He must say now—I shall give way to him if he wishes—that he will go to Sam McCluskie and the Dover port committee and ask for a secret ballot.

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Prescott: The NUS has made it clear that, when agreement has been reached in negotiations, the matter will be put to the members in a secret ballot. [HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] When the union concludes negotiations and when Sir Jeffrey Sterling comes back to the negotiating table.

Mr. Shaw: I fear that the hon. Gentleman lacks credibility. Only one secret ballot has been held. I have here the yellow paper on which it was conducted. It shows the terms on which people have accepted work. Some 1,100 have accepted, and 985 of them were audited by the closing date by the treasurer of Kent university, who is generally accepted as independent. The paper says, "I" —there is then a space for the full name and rank—

"apply for employment on the new terms and conditions proposed by the Arbitration and Conciliation and Advisory Service as detailed in the enclosed document."

Mr. Prescott: That is not a secret ballot.

Mr. Shaw: It must be a secret ballot because the forms were carried back to the P and O offices by members of the postal workers union. Unless Opposition Members maintain that communications workers opened the mail, it must have been a secret ballot.

Mr. Prescott: A secret ballot paper does not show a person's name.

Mr. Shaw: I should be grateful if Opposition Members would allow me to continue. I wish to finish to allow others to speak.

The House will want to know some of the terms that are being offered. I spoke earlier of the salaries being offered and of the cash profit-sharing scheme and the shares profit-sharing scheme. There is free travel at least once a year for signatories to the new terms. Duty-free goods are available at special prices. There are other benefits.

The House will be aware that the 24 hours on, 24 hours off service is already operated by other shipping lines. There are many shipping lines which operate around the British coast that work two crews per ship. P and O proposes three crews per ship. That is a change from 3·6 and an improvement on the original blue book terms of 2·4. P and O's main competitor in Dover—Sealink—already operates 24 hours on, 24 hours off terms. Indeed, they were negotiated by the NUS with Sealink two years ago.

I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), who has experience of working in P and O and was a member of the NUS, had one week's compassionate leave available to him. That is what P and O is putting on offer. This hard-nosed employer, as the Opposition describe it, is making one week's compassionate leave available for anybody who has a relative who dies. I did not get that when I was at work.

The terms cannot be all that bad—1,100 people have accepted and 5,000 more applicants have not been accepted. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will consider all these factors. There is no question but that safety is paramount. It is not, however, the scaremongering safety that we heard about from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). What he said was unrealistic, unsubstantiated and, for all we know, untrue.

[Mr. Shaw]

The public will want reassurance, as I am sure hon. Members will. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be able to confirm what I have been told following my inquiries—that his inspectors have checked and approved the ships, lifeboats, operating procedures and crewing arrangements of each P and O ship that puts to sea.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West frequently talks about the number of crew being reduced. He fails to say that his figures are for the Zeebrugge route and that the main change to that route is that one restaurant is being closed. The majority of the crew he referred to are waiters and waitresses who will not be required because of a restaurant closure.

The House will want to know that the company has assured me that any question about safety that I or any other hon. Member wants to raise with it will be dealt with. The company has assured me that its practice is always to overcrew.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that some of those waiters and waitresses on whom Conservative Members spat and are still spitting their contempt saved lives during the Zeebrugge disaster involving the Herald of Free Enterprise? They are vital members of the crew when accidents or fires occur.

Mr. Shaw: I freely confirm that, in my constituency and in many others, seamen lost their lives and saved the lives of others. They were seamen involved in all aspects of work. They are all important. That is why the company told me, following my inquiry, that it is the practice always to overcrew ships in case somebody goes sick. There are therefore always enough people to man lifeboats and to cope with accidents.

If any examples of that not being the case are reported to me, I shall be happy to investigate and pursue them. I would be the first to shout in the House if that happened, and I have told Sealink and P and O that. I represent a ferry port, as does my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe. It is important to both of us that the ferries are safe, because our constituents work on them, travel on them and earn their livelihoods from them.

One aspect of the terms will make ferries safer than ever before. The company has insisted—it is fundamental to the terms—that no alcohol will be consumed by any crew member on board a ship.

I spoke earlier about the difficulties facing the police. I would like to think that all hon. Members condemn the acts of violence and intimidation. People with weapons have been arrested. There has been damage to somebody's car. A company tie was tied around the windscreen wipers with the message, "Next time, this will be around your son's neck." Missiles have been thrown at coaches. Homes have been daubed with paint. They are not just seamen's homes—an 81-year-widow's home was daubed.

The intimidation is dreadful. Lists of people who are working have been assembled and circulated on picket lines. The subjects then receive telephone calls. A video recording was made of people disembarking the aeroplane when they went to crew ships. The videos were taken because, the union admitted, it wanted to have a record of who was going to work. There have been pickets at coach pick-up points. People are frightened to drive their cars across the picket line, so they have been picked up by coaches. There have been pickets at those pick-up points and one was shown on television saying to a man getting on a coach, "You have got to live in Dover for the rest of your life."

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I have been listening carefully to my hon. Friend. Will he convey my constituents' sympathies to his constituents? We endured similar circumstances for 12 months, but in the end right prevailed.

Mr. Shaw: I accept those sympathies on behalf of my constituents. I read the interventions and speeches made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) during debates on the miners' dispute. It is with annoyance and infuriation that I find some aspects of the miners' dispute being used in the seamen's dispute.

Mr. Prescott: It is the same legislation.

Mr. Shaw: Is the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) saying that he approves of intimidation at coach pick-up points?

Mr. Prescott: No, I do not; nor does the National Union of Seamen. The police have been in attendance at all those pick-up points and they say that there has been none of the sort of intimidation that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman must wonder why about 100 acts of intimidation are being investigated by the police and why 17 people have been arrested. If the hon. Gentleman looks at some of the videos on television he will see a member of the National Union of Seamen making such remarks as people get on to coaches. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will ensure that people do not picket coaches as people are getting on them.

Many members of the public are asking why the Opposition's motion does not condemn or mention acts of violence and intimidation. Many members of the public will want to know why speeches made by Opposition Members show no care about 81-year-old widows having their homes daubed with paint in the middle of the night. Opposition Members express care for 81-year-olds only during debates that suit them. Many members of the public are asking why the Labour party called on the labour movement to show solidarity in every possible way. Many of my constituents are wondering what that solidarity meant, particularly as that statement was made following acts of violence and intimidation, which have continued since it was made.

Many people are beginning to ask what the Labour party has done in this dispute. Has it helped to solve it? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Has it issued statements condemning violence? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Has it supported Sealink employees who have been prevented from working by secondary action? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Has it supported the 1,100 seamen who want to work? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Has it supported the 700 officers, and their union, who want to work? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Has it supported the many trade unionists who want a secret ballot? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] What has the Labour party done? [HON. MEMBERS:

"Nothing."] No, it has done something. It has used the dispute to fight the leadership election for the Labour party. Eight Labour Members—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Noise prolongs speeches.

Mr. Shaw: At least eight Labour Members have been on the picket lines. They have been noticed by Labour supporters in my constituency. One may wonder what is happening to those Labour supporters in my constituency. My agent is receiving telephone calls from them and they are saying that they will never vote for the Labour party again.

In 1966 the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) used some moderate words and said that disputes should be handled with care and moderation. Why do Labour Members go on the picket lines and use words such as, "War", "Struggle" and "the need for victory"?

The needs of my constituents are to get back to work, to be free to work, to be free of violence and intimidation, to allow our shopkeepers and small business men to return to normal trading and to keep the port of Dover open and the ferry industry going. I hope that the Government will support those needs, because, if they do so, my constituents and those of other hon. Members will benefit and the only losers will be those who do not want a settlement.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I now understand why P and O put £100,000 into the Tory party. It has received very good value from the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw). He told the House how he took every query raised by the seamen to the company and took the company's argument back. Apparently, seamen do not need a trade union because the hon. Gentleman will look after their interests, wherever they are in the world. They need only make a telephone call to the hon. Gentleman. P and O made a wise choice in picking the hon. Member for Dover. His speech was quite appropriate for a car park full of readers of The Sun, and no doubt those are the people who will follow it tomorrow.

One of the most odious aspects of the debate is that, after all the phoney patriotism of the Tory party about our seafarers during the Falklands war, and all that we as a nation owe to the seafarers who took part in the convoys during the last war, the true interests of seafarers should be treated with such contempt by the party that allows the Union Jack to flutter over its conferences.

We are discussing the safety of passengers, and nothing that has been said or done by Ministers responsible for safety at sea has been adequate, given the loss of life in the Zeebrugge disaster. The manager responsible for the Chernobyl power station was imprisoned following the death of people there, but there has been no appropriate action here, so it is hard to believe that the Government do anything other than share the desire of P and O to maximise its profitability.

When Ministers talk about the right to work—this dispute is about the dismissal of people—it is so hypocritical as not to carry weight with anybody listening outside the House. And if there were a ballot by seafarers on whether they want Sir Jeffrey Sterling to run their company, I have no doubt whatever what the outcome would be.

The debate has a certain quality, because the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), in his role as a kind manager, tried to warn the Front Bench not to be so provocative. We had "a Guardian leading article of a speech" from the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr Bruce). He not only wrote his own speech, but actually read from a Guardian article too. He knows quite well that there is sharp conflict in the House, because the two sides take completely different views about what should be done.

Ministers represent P and O and its interests. I understand that they employed Sir Jeffrey Sterling to advise on the anti-union legislation. When he became chairman of the company, he put money into the Tory party and enjoyed the benefits of the legislation that he helped to draft with the assistance of judges, who under our curious system are appointed by the Prime Minister.

The Opposition are closely linked to the National Union of Seamen. That union is affiliated to the Labour party because it wants a voice in the House against the sort of Tory party that is facing us. The hon. Member for Dover made a lot of Sam McCluskie being treasurer of the Labour party. That is true, and we are proud of it, but the National Union of Seamen cannot put money into the Labour party without a conference decision being made. Who held a ballot in P and O to authorise Sir Jeffrey Sterling's decision to put money into the Tory party?

It is also true—and I am proud of it—that the Labour party's national executive committee, with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in the chair, was unanimous in passing a resolution supporting the NUS and asking others to support it. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) went on the picket line as the Front-Bench spokesman and gave great hope to those who wanted to feel that in the House we spoke for them. In addition, my hon. Friend gave a marvellous presentation in the House today of the seamen's case, bringing out the fact that they want arbitration and a settlement of the dispute. It is against that background that the House must consider what is happening.

What is occurring today is the culmination of a long strategy that the Government have followed to attack and, if possible, to destroy trade unionism in Britain. It began with the readiness to spend £5 billion or £6 billion trying to defeat the miners and printers. It was followed by the use of the phoney argument of security to get rid of all the trade unions at GCHQ, under American pressure. How one is safer if a person who was in a union is not a member any more, I have never understood. If a man would give up his union membership for £1,000, I should have thought that that might throw doubt on his commitment to the security of the state. But that was done by threat. Then the Government fully supported Ford in trying to force upon the car workers in Dundee unions which they did not wish to be their representatives.

Now there is full support of P and O and the attempt to destroy the NUS through derecognition by P and O, after a long period of recognition as part of old maritime arrangements. The courts have been used to threaten sequestration if the NUS held a ballot. That has happened after all that we were told about ballots for this and ballots for that. When the NUS wanted a ballot, the judge, no doubt appointed with such an idea in mind, told the union that it would lose its funds if it consulted its members. So much for the hypocritical argument that we heard from the Tory party. The courts have stolen the money that belongs to seamen who are not involved in the dispute. The hon. Member for Eastleigh asked why the dispute should not be limited a bit, but the courts, through the legislation that he supports, have stolen the funds contributed by seamen who have nothing whatever to do with the NUS action.

Those are arguments that are understood outside the House. It amounts to the reimposition of the Combination Acts to make effective trade unionism illegal. The key question for us in the Labour party is how to defeat that strategy. None of my hon. Friends who will speak in the debate expects to have any influence on the Tory party, but we must try to point out to our friends who are in struggle how to win that struggle, because Labour Members want the seafarers to win. Their objective is arbitration. But if it is denied, the purpose of my right hon. and hon. Friends is that the seamen should win against P and O. Let there be no question about that.

The answer is that the seamen's victory will depend upon their own efforts. It will not depend upon speeches that are made in the House. We shall be trounced tonight in the Lobby in accordance with the predictions, just as we were with the computer predictions at the previous general election. But the seafarers have the capacity to win. On the radio at lunchtime I heard an hon. Member saying that the time has come for wiser counsels to prevail. That showed that he recognised, as the hon. Member for Eastleigh recognised, that the seafarers have done very well in getting their case over to the public. Victory also depends on the amount of industrial support that is available to them from other unions. Public support is growing. I read about the lorry drivers putting in their penn'orth, which shows that the Government's legislation is not capable of dealing with the situation.

The seafarers will decide how to run their own strike. It is not for anybody in the House to tell them what to do, and court action will not stop them, for one simple reason. When the unions began, they did not have any money to sequestrate in the first place. If the courts steal the unions' money, they will go on without it because, unlike companies, trade unionism is not measured by the bank balance. It is measured by what is in people's hearts when they feel that their cause is right. One can steal their money and take away their offices and typewriters, but one cannot beat trade unionism by court action. It cannot be done in Poland, and it cannot be done here. That point needs to be made.

When trade unionism began, it was illegal. It was established by breaking unjust laws. I know that nobody in the House likes this to be said, because we sit in a little club and pretend that we gave every liberty to everybody from this Chamber. It is not true. That is why we enjoy the right to worship as we like, the right to have trade unions and the right of men to vote. The Prime Minister would not have been Prime Minister if the suffragettes had not broken the law to force women's suffrage.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way because I am coming to the end of my speech. [HON. MEMBERS: "They do not like it."] Of course the Tory party does not like it.

In the end, the five Employment Acts carried through by the Tory party will be repealed, just as the Taff Vale judgment was repealed by legislation, and just as the Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act was repealed by a subsequent Government——

Mr. Jacques Arnold: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Benn: I am not giving way, and it is not a point of order.

Mr. Arnold: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it appropriate to have a leadership election speech in this debate?

Mr. Benn: What really frightens the Tory party is that the Leader of the Opposition is leading a completely united party. That is what it is all about.

The Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act was repealed, and the Industrial Relations Act was repealed. I believe that the seafarers' struggle has a better chance of succeeding than that of the miners or the printers, because many other things have happened in the meantime. A parallel has been drawn with the miners. I tell the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) that the miners' support groups, established four years ago, are back in action and have been giving money and support to the seamen in their struggle. The printers are doing the same.

Those who watch the Tory party, with its long pretence of fairness, have also seen the Budget, the social security changes, the poll tax and all the other things that have happened.

Mr. Redwood rose——

Mr. Benn: I am not giving way. I am in almost my last sentence.

The Tory party has been critical of the trade union movement for a long time. I looked for the root of some of the arguments and found two quotations. The first is about industrial action:

"the real intention was to strike a full blow in the face of the State's authority, against the middle classes and against disciplined order".

The second quotation speaks of the trade union movement as "being used merely as the battering ram for the class war."

The first quotation is from Mussolini's autobiography, and the second is from "Mein Kampf" by Adolf Hitler.

I said in the House the other day—I invite hon. Members and my colleagues to look at it—that weekend speeches by Ministers and the policies that they follow in respect of the trade union movement can be traced right back to what was said in the 1920s and 1930s in Italy and Germany. Combine that with the attack on the Greater London council and on local authorities, and the court protection to deny us the right to read what Peter Wright wrote in "Spycatcher", and one gets a very clear idea of a Government who are set to undermine democratic rights in this country.

And in the struggle for democratic rights, nobody has done more than the trade union movement to win the rights of working people in industry and to build democracy.

6.9 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I have never seen a better demolition job done on the Labour party than that done this afternoon by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw). He not only answered every point—certainly to my satisfaction—but he carried the fight into the enemy camp, and he had some of the heavies in the Opposition reeling from shock. I congratulate him. As an hon. Member representing a Southampton constituency, I have been worried that secondary picketing might slow down the progress of the port of Southampton. This afternoon we have had a difficulty, of course, with the QE2. I have received a telephone message that all the picketing by the National Union of Seamen to prevent the QE2 from sailing this afternoon has been to no avail. It sailed just after 4 o'clock, and is now beginning to make its return journey to New York. The NUS seems to be losing the battle outside the Dover area.

I have a newspaper cutting about the Canberra. The NUS has pleaded with its members on the Canberra to come out on strike. As the Canberra is a P and O liner, one would have thought that the union would have been successful. Even two coachloads of pickets at the entrance to Southampton docks were prevented from succeeding by a heavy police reinforcement. I do not think that the NUS is obeying the legislation when it brings two coachloads of pickets from another area to prevent a ship sailing from the port of Southampton. It is breaking the law.

The NUS does not seem to mind any more. It has had its money sequestered; it has been shut out of its offices; two Opposition Members have lost their flats; and the whole thing is beginning to look rather nasty for some of its members. Nevertheless, it is still prepared to break the law—and breaking the law it is. The NUS is being found out, not only by the majority of the members of the NUS, but by the British public. Think of the hardship suffered by the British public and also the French citizens who are on holiday here.

Damage is also being caused to our export-import industry that uses the Channel ferries. Think how Opposition Members will crow in a couple of months' time when our import and export figures look distorted. They will say that it is the Government's fault. They will not realise that they need look no further than this rather unfortunate deadlock caused by the National Union of Seamen.

There was some plagiarism this afternoon by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). Hon. Members may recall that a presidential candidate in the United States had to resign because he used a speech given by the Leader of the Opposition. Either the hon. Member for Oldham, West wrote the article attributed to Mr. Sam McCluskie in The Sunday Times on Sunday or it was written by Mr. McCluskie. I heard the hon. Member for Oldham, West on television and this afternoon, and he said, almost word for word, what was contained in that article under the smiling face of Sam McCluskie. Someone has to be using plagiarism to enhance his own speeches. Will the Opposition tell us who wrote the article?

As an hon. Member representing a Southampton constituency, may I say that the difficulty is that, although we no longer have cross-Channel ferries, the National Union of Seamen has been effective enough to stop cross-Channel ferries at the port of Portsmouth. It is not only causing difficulties for visitors to islands such as Jersey and Guernsey, but also people in the transport industry in carrying out their normal trade. There are many such people in Southampton.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said that he was all for complete freedom. He would go on the picket line. He would aid and abet if he could, because that is his way of life and he can see no other way forward. The right hon. Gentleman must realise the terrible harm that would be done if we gave a distorted view to those workers in the NUS or, indeed, to the public.

Mr. Redwood: I was sorry that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) would not take my intervention, because I wanted to clarify whether he was saying that, to further this dispute, members of the National Union of Seamen should break the law, and suggesting that judges were biased. I hope that he will withdraw that remark as it is a damaging slur on the fine tradition of neutrality of the law.

Mr. Hill: I agree with my hon. Friend. In fact, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield went further. He said that the Government were appointing judges who would do their will and would sequestrate the funds of a union without evidence; the judges would be obedient to the Government. The right hon. Gentleman must know that that is nonsense. That is the politics of the 1930s. The right hon. Gentleman must be answered. I hope that an Opposition Member will answer him because he is getting away with a false argument.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Will the hon. Gentleman consider the statement made by a judge, that the NUS must stop pussyfooting about? Does not that show clear bias?

Mr. Hill: Am I seriously being asked whether the Government told a judge to make a statement containing the word "pussyfooting"? The judge must be answerable for his own words. However, there is anxiety about the pattern followed after the sequestration of funds. Advisers of Mr. Scargill are now coming to help. A newspaper headline states:

"Striking seamen divert cash to beat asset freeze."

They are trying to circumvent the law. If they think like the right hon. Gentleman, possibly they will justify it. But the law is the law, and they have broken the law. Until they purge their contempt of court and receive their funds back, they will have to stay in this position.

P and O management and the NUS will not get around the table because of straightforward commercial opposition. The law of the land is straightforward. Although the Government have the Arbitration, Conciliation and Advisory Service to bring both sides together, they will not intervene. If both sides are rigidly opposed, they must slug it out to the end. That is the only way to resolve the dispute. As long as the NUS members realise that their union officials are telling them, "Slug it out to the end, lads; we shall win", because that is the name of the game, it will be a slug to the end. However, I think that the cooler and more intelligent reasoning in the NUS —similar to that on the Canberra and QE2—will gradually prevail, and it will be realised that there must be a meeting of minds about the difficulties of 1992, the possibility of VAT, the removal of duty-free goods and the dangers of the Channel tunnel. The two sides must come together. We cannot let almost historic dinosaur-type trade union quotes decide the issue.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) made a very interesting speech, but I trust that the public will not take much notice of it. He referred to the lack of credibility of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). The hon. Member for Dover suggested that my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and I were on the picket lines in Dover advocating violence. I was asked by a representative of my local press whether that was true, and I replied, as I cannot reply in this House, that it was a deliberate lie, and that was printed in the local press. I want to make it absolutely clear that no one has been talking about violence on the picket lines. Reference has been made to intimidation. What about the intimidation of workers in the National Union of Seamen who have been told to accept the conditions and sign, or they will be sacked? Is that not intimidation?

The hon. Member for Dover referred to those who had agreed to the conditions and said that 5,000 people had applied for jobs. I am surprised at that. With 2·5 million or 3 million people unemployed in this country, I am amazed that only 5,000 applied for the jobs. I should not have been surprised if 50,000 had applied. The level of unemployment is being used as a weapon against the trade union movement and workers who are trying to maintain decent conditions which they have negotiated over the years.

Mr. Mans: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heffer: No, I will not give way.

The hon. Member for Dover made several other points. He was kind enough to refer to a speech that I made in the House in 1966 when the National Union of Seamen held an official strike. I recall my speech very well. My Front-Bench colleagues at the time were talking about a small group of politically motivated men running the official strike. I explained that there was another group of politically motivated men and women in No. 10 Downing street. I believed then that the NUS was right, and I have a right to say that.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is aware, there was a great unofficial strike in 1960. For my sins, together with the then hon. Member for Bootle, Mr. Simon Mahon, I was asked to be a mediator by the Liverpool Trades Council and the Labour party. We were not asked to mediate between the employers and the union, because the real mediation had to take place between the rank and file of the union and the union leadership.

There was a great surge at the time among the membership. They wanted to create a new union. We said that they should not do that, but should remain in the union and fight to democratise it. They democratised it and made it one of the most democratic unions in this country. They did not need legislation to introduce ballots. They created a democratic organisation and got rid of the leadership, which I believe was in the pockets of the employers at the time. They made it one of the most democratic unions in the country, and that is what it remains.

The hon. Member for Dover referred to the blue book and the red book. I did not see the blue book, but I have seen the red one. If the red book is an improvement on the blue book, God help us. I can understand why NUS members are not prepared to accept the red book. Those who have accepted it have done so under pressure.

Mr. Benn: Pressure of dismissal.

Mr. Heffer: That is right. They are worried about their future.

Do those hon. Members who have never put their hands to any employment believe that the workers go on strike because they want to? Do they honestly believe that workers are only too happy to lose their wages and go home to their wives and say, "I am sorry, love. I am not bringing in any money at the end of the week"? Do hon. Members believe that the workers in this country are stupid?

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): No, but the hon. Gentleman is.

Mr. Heffer: I know about this because I have worked in industry and the hon. Lady has not. That is the difference.

Mrs. Gorman: Withdraw.

Mr. Heffer: No, I will not withdraw it, because it is true. I have already received abuse from the hon. Member for Dover and many others.

I watched the faces of people such as Dunlop on television. Anyone who has watched Dunlop on television knows who is backing him. He is being backed by the Government and their legislation. That is the truth of the matter.

The trade union movement and the NUS in particular at this juncture are fighting for their very existence. The trade union movement is threatened by the Government's anti-trade union legislation, which is the worst in Europe and rather like Jaruzelski's legislation in Poland. Conservative Members are brave and support the rights of Polish workers to have trade unions, but when it comes to our trade unions, it is a different story. I believe that Solidarity has a right to exist in Poland. Because I live in this country, I defend the rights of our workers to have the democratic organisation which Conservative Members do not accept and in which they cannot believe.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East answered the point about the secret ballot. The NUS was prepared to have another ballot, but it was taken to court, and that stopped the ballot. Conservative Members are only too well aware of that.

Mr. Rogers: I agree with my hon. Friend that many Conservative Members are neo-Fascists——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is aware that that is not a parliamentary expression. Please will he withdraw it and say something else?

Mr. Rogers: I understand that to call Conservative Members Fascists is out of order. However, I understand that Mr. Speaker has ruled previously——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that he must not argue with the Chair. Will he withdraw the expression?

Mr. Rogers: For the purposes of the debate, and in pursuance of the advocacy of my colleagues, I will withdraw that expression. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) is aware of the extreme political Right-wing views of Conservative Members. Does he accept that it is sickening hypocrisy for a succession of Conservative Members to claim that the Government will not intervene in the dispute because it is a commercial issue, while the Prime Minister has on at least six occasions since January met Sir Jeffrey Sterling, the owner of P and O? Is that non-intervention?

Mr. Heffer: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. I heard a Minister on the radio this morning discussing the issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I was not surprised by what the Minister said, but it was remarkable how he repeatedly stated that it was nothing to do with the Government. He said that the Government could not intervene. Previous Tory Governments, even the Heath Government—if I may use that expression—were prepared on occasion to intervene in the national interest. Instead, the Government equate the national interest with the class interest of those whom they represent. That is their national interest. It has nothing to do with any real national interest.

I support the motion. It is not the greatest motion in the world, and it does not necessarily say everything that I would want it to say, but it is important in the sense that it raises all the important issues. It should be supported even by Conservative Members. They should have sufficient interest in the future of the shipping industry to realise that they should support the motion.

I use the Channel ferries regularly when travelling from Dover to France. I use that general term because there are ports other than Calais. I am interested particularly in safety. How can the Government say that they are concerned about safety when the numbers of seamen will be reduced? If they are really concerned about the safety of passengers, they must be concerned also about crew numbers. That must follow if they are to ensure that there is genuine safety. That is the real issue, apart from the future of the National Union of Seamen.

The Government are dodging their responsibility of ensuring that there is safety for the passengers and crews of the future. They are dodging also their responsibility to the shipping industry generally and to the ferries in particular.

Mr. Loyden: My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) talked about seamen working an 18-hour day, and about rest periods. What will be the consequences for safety if seamen work an 18-hour uninterrupted shift? Will my hon. Friend spell out the implications to the House?

Mr. Heffer: I think that my hon. Friend has done that in implied terms in making that intervention. I believe that he is right.

I referred the other day to the port manager of Heysham harbour cutting a rope of the Tynwald with a chainsaw on 30 April while that vessel was berthed at Heysham. I received a written answer from a Department of Employment Minister, part of which I shall read. It states:

"I have been asked to reply. No. The Merchant Shipping Act did not apply to the incident referred. On the information available neither the ship, its crew nor any person ashore were endangered by the action of the harbour master and there was no contravention of any legal requirement."—[Official Report, 9 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 22.]

I also received a letter from Sea Containers, which was written by none other than the public affairs manager. I shall not quote the entire letter, which I would describe as a whitewash. Part of it reads:

"The Tynwald was secured by six ropes (three at each end of the ship). There are two head ropes, two stern ropes and two spring ropes (one at the forehead and one aft)."

Incidentally, I was being told to suck eggs, because one knows about these matters after working on a line of docks for a long time. The letter continues:

"The port master cut the forehead spring rope and was proceeding to cut the head rope when the ship's master instructed him to stop. The third rope also went slack and then the other ropes were released. The ship moved from one berth to another under its own power and thus this became a normal manoeuvre from berth to berth."

So a normal manoeuvre involves the cutting of ropes. I have never heard anything like it. The Government are not prepared to take action against an illegal act. Their response shows that they consider themselves to be above the law. However, when the NUS takes legitimate action and organises secondary pickets, it is made clear that it is not above the law. That proves our case and makes it clear where the Government stand.

6.35 pm

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): This has been a debate of some passion. That is understandable because we are dealing with issues of great concern to hon. Members and to those whom we represent. I urge Conservative Members to buy a copy of the tape recording of these proceedings. They should listen to themselves chanting in unison with the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw). If they do that, they will hear echoes of Nuremberg and they will be ashamed of themselves.

It is regrettable that the Secretary of State for Employment said that he would say nothing new. Unfortunately, that was true. More is the pity. He should have said something new.

There is no doubt that the genesis of the dispute lies in the Channel tunnel. We have all known from the beginning that there would be difficulties. We argued that there should be proper arrangements for the ferries, including competition checks. The Government told us that everything would be sorted out if the issue were left to market forces. That is why we are landed in this mess.

There has been great apprehension in the ferry fleets, and most of it has been stoked up by the owners. They have emphasised the dangers facing the ferries, the number of jobs that will have to go and the problems that will be faced. The apprehension has been fostered by the owners. The NUS understands that changes will be required. There is a general agreement that jobs will have to go, but it is with great reluctance that that has been acceped by the union. We have a dispute because P and O has insisted repeatedly that the changes must take place by March. This has precluded any proper period of phasing.

An emotionally charged issue in an emotionally charged area has been made all the more difficult by the fact that Sealink stepped in and said that, if P and O got its way, it, Sealink, would develop the same conditions. That was a secondary threat. It is not for us to take lessons from Conservative Members on secondary action when threats are being made by other ferry owners.

The problem is compounded by the difficulties that are created by industrial relations legislation. The law has not helped in any sense to stabilise matters. If the parties to an industrial dispute find themselves in the legal arena, there is no sensible way out of it. The Government do not understand solidarity action within trade unions. They do not understand the loyalty of members to their unions. The Government live in ignorance of the fact that industrial disputes have their own momentum and dynamism. They refuse to recognise that what is required of them is some form of conciliation and arbitration.

There are those who take a charitable view of the Secretary of State for Employment and say that he would like to be tempted by the forbidden fruit of conciliation but he is afraid to let that happen in case he succeeds, finds that conciliation works and gets a taste for it. He knows that if that happened he would be taken to No. 10 Downing street and sent on a long march to purgatory, either to Northern Ireland or to the loneliness of the Government Back Benches. That is the problem.

There are less charitable people, some of whom are realists. I am one of those realists, and I believe that conciliation is anathema to the Government. They think that the right to manage means that might is right. Their view is that, no matter who is harmed in the process and irrespective of the damage that is done to the nation, industrial disputes must be resolved by a trial of strength. In ordinary circumstances, that would be bad enough, but in this instance the Secretary of State should surely have a restraining influence on the Secretary of State for Employment. His constant theme over the past 14 months —ever since the Zeebrugge disaster—is that safety is paramount. We have been told that safety comes first.

It is a disgrace that, whenever safety has been mentioned this evening, Conservative Members have sniggered or laughed. They did not laugh and snigger 14 months ago when tributes were being paid to seamen for saving lives in the Zeebrugge disaster. They did not laugh and snigger when seamen gave of their best in the Falklands dispute. All of that has been forgotten. Conservative Members did not laugh and snigger either when the "Brass Tacks" programme was mentioned. I concede to the Secretary of State that he has written to me to say that there will be a rigorous inquiry. I hope that it will concentrate on safety. Nowhere in the P and O proposals is there any assessment of the safety aspects of the new crewing proposals. That is not to be found in the red book, in the blue book, or anywhere else.

Nor has there been any assessment of the consequences of fatigue in respect of reaction time. In 1982 the Department of Transport was concerned about fatigue among watch keepers and said that it would study the subject. But nothing has happened since 1982, apart from pious words. Are our memories so short? Have our memories of Zeebrugge been dulled by other disasters? Have our recollections been blunted by the fact that Zeebrugge was followed by the King's Cross disaster, as is suggested in the newspapers today? How can the Secretary of State for Transport be sure that the safety conditions are so good that he can put his name to the Government amendment?

The Secretary of State might do well to look back on his pious words of the day after the King's Cross disaster, and to his complacent remarks about how safety was paramount in London Transport. However, if he reads the inquiry evidence, he will learn that safety conditions were not as he described them to be. In the light of that evidence, the Minister should be more careful about dismissing safety and the dangers of fatigue among seamen.

The Secretary of State must bear in mind that this is not the end of the story, whatever may happen in respect of the P and O dispute. What we are afraid of, and what we cannot afford, is a job auction among ferry operators in the North sea. P and O say that one of the main reasons why it wants to alter crewing conditions is that that will double the company's profits. What will happen in two years? The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) gave the game away. He said that at least the deal was available for two years. What will happen after that if P and O and Sealink, as well as other operators, discover that their profits are not as large as they once thought? Will crew members be reduced yet again? Will even longer working hours be imposed on the grounds that it is only efficiency and profit that matter? If the Secretary of State believes that that is the way to deal with matters, he is living in a fool's paradise.

The greatest irony of all is that the ports are being blocked not by the National Union of Seamen or by the Transport and General Workers Union but by freelance truck drivers. They are all friends of Mrs. Thatcher, saying that they do not support the NUS and that they are not in favour of strikes. They say also that they want the dispute to be settled. Had those freelance truck drivers been union members, Ron Todd would have been in court today and the TGWU would have had its funds sequestered. What will the Government do about those lorry drivers? I ask the Secretary of State that question, but he remains silent because he does not know the answer.

If those truck drivers had been TGWU members, practically every newspaper would have carried banner headlines about hooliganism and intimidation. Instead of that—I do not want to overdraw the case—it seems that they are being held up as heroes. The industrial relations law has no relevance or meaning in respect of the way in which those lorry drivers choose to deal with the situation, and we do not know how the Government intend to react.

The lorry drivers are clearly saying that they want negotiations restarted and the dispute settled by discussion and negotiation. That is a common refrain among both lorry drivers and the National Union of Seamen. It is a common refrain even among P and O shareholders. They are also saying that negotiations should be restarted or that the dispute should be sent to arbitration. Everyone is willing to go to arbitration, and certainly the NUS is willing. The only people who appear to be standing back are Sir Jeffrey Sterling and the Government. All the voices that have been raised in this matter and all the newspaper articles are saying that they want the matter to be settled by negotiation. It is true that ACAS has been in touch from time to time during the past 14 weeks. However, there is a significant difference between an ACAS that is working with the enthusiastic support of the Government and an ACAS that is working in the face of sustained Government hostility to conciliation. The dispute could be quickly resolved if only the Government would have the sense to deal with it by conciliation.

Is there anyone in the Cabinet who has the vision and the courage to understand what is happening? Is there anyone in the Cabinet who remembers our debt to the seafarers of the Falklands and Zeebrugge? Is there anyone in the Cabinet with the courage to stand for justice and who appreciates that the dispute can be resolved if only they had the vision to intervene? I hope that someone will be prepared to take up that challenge. If no one in the Cabinet is prepared to do so, I ask the House to take up that challenge. I ask the House to vote for our motion so that the dispute may be settled in the best possible way, which is by reconciliation and conciliation to the benefit of all those involved, including the seamen and the people of Dover. The House will do a great service to the nation if it passes our motion.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Paul Channon): I can start by telling the House some good news, which is pleasing—and it will be particularly pleasing to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). The information that I have just been given is that National Union of Seamen members employed on oil rig supply ships will be instructed by their union tomorrow to return to work. I am told that that undertaking was made at Edinburgh quarter sessions today. That is one dispute which will be out of the way, and I hope that it is a precedent for other disputes. As was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), the seamen's dispute is with P and O European Ferries and not with other people.

In the short time available to me I shall concentrate on the issue that has dominated practically every speech from both sides of the House, safety, for which I have direct responsibility. Those who are worried about the safety of the present P and O service have voiced three main anxieties. They say that crew numbers are being reduced to unacceptable levels; that untrained crews are being employed; and that crews are being asked to work unreasonably long hours. I can reassure the House on all three points.

The revised crew complement, including officers, for the two ships presently sailing—the Pride of Bruges and the Pride of Kent—complies with all the statutory manning level requirements. Those deal with the numbers and qualifications of officers to be carried on a ship. They specify also the number of crew members to be on board who have to be certificated as proficient in the operation and use of survival craft. They require the owner to ensure that there are sufficient qualified ratings to permit the master and chief engineer to organise the watch keeping arrangement with proper regard to the need for rest periods.

The revised complement meets all those statutory requirements. P and O has sought and obtained from my Department a safe manning certificate that specifies the minimum number of officers and ratings considered necessary for the safe running of the ship. The revised complement complies with the terms of the certificate.

The safe manning of a ship is not just a matter of having the correct number of crew on board; it is also a question of deploying them effectively. That is the crucial point. Therefore, a reduction in manning levels does not lead to a reduction in safety standards. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) reminded the House on Monday that the NUS itself is not opposed to P and O's proposals on reduced manning levels. The disagreement between the company and the union relates to the timetable for achieving those reductions. The union is prepared, over a period of years, to accept reductions. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Either the revised crewing arrangements are safe or they are not. If they are safe, as my Department is satisfied that they are, they can be introduced. Delay may be attractive to the NUS for many reasons, but safety is not one of them. If the ships will be safe in three years' time, one cannot argue that safety is the cause of the present dispute.

It has been suggested that untrained crews are being employed. The vessels have the proper complement of qualified officers on board and the requisite number of certificated seafarers, so the suggestion that crews are untrained is wrong. Many crew members have experience in ferries; others are new recruits to P and O but are experienced seafarers.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West criticised the work of my surveyors over the past few days. They have made a comprehensive inspection of each ship and have watched each crew implementing the revised emergency procedures and safety drills: the muster drills, the fire-fighting procedures and the lifeboat drills. The inspections were made and the drills were witnessed before the ships left their lay-up berths in Rotterdam, and the drills were witnessed again when the crews were changed at Dover. On each occasion, my surveyors were satisfied that the requisite numbers of qualified personnel were on board and that they were properly trained in all the relevant procedures. If and when further P and O ships are brought back into service, the same rigorous inspections will be made, so that that form of scaremongering is wholly irresponsible.

I can assure the House that the letter and spirit of the law were complied with; and I can also assure the House that the crews of these ships have proved to my surveyors that they are able to put their training into practice if ever the need should unfortunately arise.

The last anxiety about safety relates to the length of hours worked. As I understand it, the length of shifts worked under the new manning arrangements being introduced by P and O are as follows. Ratings on ferries to Calais work 12-hour shifts. Ratings on ferries to Zeebrugge and Boulogne are on board ship for 24-hour shifts. That, as my hon. Friends have said, is a pattern already in use on cross-Channel ferries on a number of routes. Such ratings usually have 14 hours on duty and 10 hours off. Officers work 12-hour shifts, as they have done for many years.

My surveyors are fully satisfied—this point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw)—that the crewing arrangements permit watch keeping duties to be undertaken without risk of fatigue. Perhaps before finishing with this subject I should remind the House that P and O seafarers spend 24 hours on ship for 122 days a year. They are present at their place of work for the equivalent of two and a half days a week; and they are actually on duty for the equivalent of fewer than one and a half days a week. I leave it to the House to decide whether these arrangements are excessively fatiguing.

Mr. Prescott: They are not true.

Mr. Channon: They are indeed true.

Before leaving the issue of safety, I turn to the references made to "Brass Tacks" and to other criticisms of ferry safety. I wrote to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North about them a few days ago. A former employee of P and O alleged that one of its vessels sailed last August with a deck crew of 11, against a complement of 17. That allegation is now being fully investigated. I cannot yet say whether it is true or whether any offence has been committed. If an offence has been committed, appropriate action will be taken. It is very unfortunate that such an allegation was not made until nine months after the event. The criticisms are serious ones. If they are true, why were they not made earlier? Why were they made in the middle of an industrial dispute rather than a few days after the alleged event? However, the delay will not prevent us from establishing the facts of the matter. They will be fully investigated and I can assure the House that appropriate action will be taken.

The blockade by the lorry drivers is a serious source of disruption, although I hope that the talks today will bring a breakthrough. I can well understand the frustration of the lorry drivers, which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh pointed out. None of us can condone the form that their action has taken. The drivers have made their point. Their action is not helping to resolve the dispute; they are causing an obstruction; and they have been warned by Dover harbour board that legal action is possible.

Above all, truckers, seafarers and all involved in the dispute should reflect on the long-term implications of their actions. The Channel tunnel will be completed in 1993. If transport by road and ferry is to compete with the tunnel, it will have to do so on price and reliability. Do hon. Members imagine that the events of the past few weeks have enhanced the reputation of the ferries or the likelihood of their being able to compete effectively with the Channel tunnel? The House must judge the wisdom of these actions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh said, it is doubtful whether a debate in the House during a delicate industrial dispute such as this will help.

Opposition Members stated a number of things over and over again in the debate—especially the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). It will be utterly clear to anyone who has heard the debate or who reads reports of it that the Labour party has in no way shaken off its anachronistic view of the British economy. We are no longer living in the subsidised 1970s; we are living in the efficient 1980s. Competitiveness and efficiency count now. These, together with safety, are the features that are required if a public service is to function effectively. No one should be under any illusion about the attitude of the Labour party in the debate. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott)—we have heard all the Opposition leadership candidates today—has said:

"The whole history of the Labour movement emphasises the need to ally politically with industrial action".

The most alarming feature of the debate has been the irresponsible behaviour of the Opposition. Regular appearances on the picket lines and inflammatory speeches this evening have been their contribution. Do they think that all this will help to achieve a speedily negotiated settlement of the dispute? The right hon. Member for Chesterfield was honest enough not to pretend that the debate would make any difference—he said it would not—and that what happened outside the House was what mattered. However, if anyone is influenced by what we say in the House tonight, I urge hon. Members to face up to their responsibilities when advising people outside the House. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield may not become the leader of the Labour party, but it is clear that his ideas are still prevalent within it on issues of this sort.

This strike and the attitude of the Labour party are living proof that these attitudes have not yet died. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dover pointed out, in the past few weeks at Dover there have been 103 reports of intimidation and 17 arrests. In this debate, not one member of the Labour party criticised that intimidation or suggested that the unions should obey the law. Not one of them believes in the rule of law. Do not the Opposition recognise that people have the right to work without fear or intimidation? The Labour party puts the right to strike above the right to work. It appears that Opposition Members do not believe in the rule of law when it does not suit them. They blame the judges, or anyone else.

The Labour party should stop fuelling the dispute with promises of solidarity or of a special strike fund. The time has come for Opposition Members to use their influence with the NUS to tell it to respect the laws of the land. Why do they not condemn secondary picketing and law breakers? Why do they not condemn the continuation of outdated working practices that cost the nation and workers dear? The Labour party is acting against the interests of those it pretends to represent. I ask the House to reject this ridiculous motion so that we may get a sensible result to the dispute—not one motivated by the outdated ideological ideas of the Labour party, which have been shown so clearly in the debate.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, noting that Government policies have established a sound and stable legal framework for the conduct of industrial relations which has significantly reduced the incidence and impact of disputes; that the National Union of Seamen has rejected various proposals for resolving this dispute; that stringent safety inspections have been carried out by Department of Transport surveyors on the P & O ferries 'Pride of Bruges' and 'Pride of Kent', covering not only the vessels themselves and their equipment, but also the manning arrangements and the training of the crew; believes that the resolution of industrial disputes must be a matter for the parties concerned operating within the law and within their economic circumstances; and condemns acts of intimidation and unlawful secondary action designed to resolve industrial disputes by means outside the law.'.

Points of Order

7.26 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. By way of a written question to the Minister of State, Home Office I raised questions concerning the number of qualified and non-qualified persons employed over various dates in the magistrates courts in each of the petty sessional divisions of England and Wales. Tonight I received, dated 11 May, what might be called an advance copy of the response, on which I had a holding answer on 21 April which merely states:

"I have today written to the hon. Member and a copy of the reply has been placed in the Library."

When one asks a parliamentary question, the object of the exercise is for not only the hon. Member but the public to find out what the situation is. The general public does not have access to the Library of the House of Commons, but over the past few years I have noticed that this practice has grown. If Members of Parliament are to do their job properly, it is only right and proper that the question should appear in Hansard. Therefore, I raise this issue as a matter of principle.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that anything out of order has occurred. I understand that that is done regularly, particularly when lengthy documents are involved.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it concern the next Bill? I think that we should get on to the Bill.

Mr. Cryer: It concerns the previous debate, Mr. Speaker. When you, Mr. Speaker, were not in the Chair, the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), on a point of order, suggested that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), in an intervention, had omitted to make a declaration that he was receiving an advantage from the NUS. You, Mr. Speaker, will know that it was uncalled for, untrue and dishonest of the hon. Member for Amber Valley to make that suggestion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover is not, in the words of the hon. Member for Amber Valley, in receipt of any grace-and-favour advantage from the NUS. The flat in which he has been staying for some time has had a fair rent fixed under the legislation for 14 years. In any event, during the dispute my hon. Friend has not been living in that flat. The hon. Member for Amber Valley suggested that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover has been less than forthright about this issue. That is patently untrue and casts doubts on a Member of this House. When doubt of that kind is cast, it is usual for the hon. Member who has cast that doubt to withdraw his comment. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to require the hon. Member for Amber Valley to withdraw the uncalled-for and disreputable aspersion that he has cast on my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is big enough to look after himself, but it would be worth while to look tomorrow at the exchanges in Hansard and at the disgraceful allegation by the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), who used the phrase, "a cut-price, grace-and-favour flat." Had my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) been living in a cut-price flat, which clearly he was not, he ought to have been congratulated on saving Parliament money. A Member of Parliament's rent is paid out of the London allowance and any hon. Member who is able to negotiate a cheaper rent for his flat is saving Parliament money.

The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) is recorded in the Register of Members' Interests as having 11 directorships and consultancies, including Corporate and Public Affairs Strategy Limited. When I tabled an early-day motion during the Land Rover strike, the hon. Gentleman tabled an amendment that, word for word, was the management's case during the dispute, from which people may draw the conclusion that by means of one of his consultancies he was acting on behalf of the Land Rover management in this place.

That is OK, but then the hon. Gentleman accused my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover, who has no grace-and-favour relationship with the National Union of Seamen. He is a Member sponsored by the National Union of Mineworkers. He has correctly notified the House of that fact each year since the Register of Members' Interests was compiled. After looking at Hansard tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, you ought to require the hon. Member for Amber Valley to make a personal statement to the House withdrawing the allegation and personally apologising to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is always very quick to demand financial details about other hon. Members——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that we ought to go into that matter now. I call the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim).

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] After an intervention earlier today by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), I asked Mr. Deputy Speaker, on a point of order, whether it was in order for somebody who had not declared a possible interest—[HON. MEMBERS: "An interest."]—an interest in the National Union of Seamen not to declare it. I stated that the hon. Member for Bolsover had lived in a flat for which he paid a grace-and-favour rent and that later I had found out that the rent was only £18.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): No.

Mr. Oppenheim: Despite the fact that I stayed in the Chamber for some time after making that point of order, the hon. Member for Bolsover chose to wait until I had left before stating that it was not a subsidised rent but that it had been fixed by the rent officer. I suggest that a rent of £18 must have been fixed a long time ago.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter on which I can adjudicate. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) referred to the rent that had previously been paid by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) as a cut-price rent. He also suggested that he had been failing in his duty to the House by not declaring that he was paying a subsidised rent.

It is improper for the hon. Member for Amber Valley to suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover should have registered that rent in the Register of Members' Interests. If, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover says, it was a registered rent, there can be no question of it being a subsidised rent. At the very least, Mr. Speaker, I think that you ought to rule that if it were a registered rent, my hon. Friend should not be expected to declare such a rent in the Register of Members' Interests, otherwise any hon. Member who is paying a rent or who has a mortgage would be obliged to say how much was being paid.

Mr. Speaker: I think——

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) will allow me to deal with this point, because I think I can help him. I confirm that, if the rent had been judged to be a fair rent by the rent tribunal, what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said was correct. Last week the hon. Member for Bolsover gave me the reasons why he had moved out of the flat. I am sure that the whole House will agree that the hon. Member for Bolsover is a man of high integrity. I respect the fact that he gave me that information and also the reasons that he gave me for his decision.

Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill

(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.35 pm

Mr. Michael Welsh (Doncaster, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Hon. Members know that I am not familiar with all the procedures of the House, and on this occasion I seem to have let myself down. The Order Paper reads:

> On Second Reading of the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill, to move, That the Bill be read a second time upon this day six months.

As a mere Back Bencher, I thought that six months meant six months. As there was an objection on 28 January, six months from 28 January would be 28 July, not 11 May. If the six months are to run from the day of the Bill's deposit, which was 27 November, that will not be until 28 May, which is a Saturday. I do not suppose that any hon. Member wants to come here on a Saturday to deal with this important business. When a period of six months is given, is it really six months, or can the Government, at their whim, set down business for consideration on any day that they desire?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The setting down of private business is the responsibility of the Chairman of Ways and Means. It is not a Government responsibility. The hon. Gentleman is drawing attention to a motion on the Order Paper, not to a decision. A motion is used as a device to prevent a Bill from being given its Second Reading without debate. The fact that we are having a debate now makes that motion entirely nugatory.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Bill in its present form does not seem to me to be acceptable, and I ask for your guidance and advice. The Government are supporting the Bill. I had been led to understand that Governments do not involve themselves with private business. A large number of people in Nottinghamshire, Yorkshire and Lancashire will be affected by the Bill. The EEC turned down an application for grant-aid because the proposal would have an adverse effect on other similar installations. As the Government and many other people are involved, I suggest that this is a hybrid Bill and that it is unacceptable in its present form.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, the Bill has been, as it must, before the Examiners to ensure that Standing Orders have been complied with. The Examiners reported the Bill to the House on 18 December and were satisfied that Standing Orders had been complied with. The Bill may have effects on a wide section of the community, but that is a matter for debate and a matter to be taken into account by the House when it reaches its conclusion.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): On an entirely different point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In fact, I have two points of order, the second having developed from the first. This morning in the post I received a statement from the promoters of the Bill. This seemed to be an act of slovenliness, giving hon. Members grossly inadequate notice. I looked at the copy of "Erskine May" in the Aye Lobby, where I found a relevant paragraph on page 890. I then consulted the appropriate officer. I also consulted the copy of "Erskine May" in the Chamber. The same paragraph appears in the edition of "Erskine May" in the Chamber, not on page 890, but on page 969, I also discovered that there was no copy of "Erskine May" in the No Lobby. That is one point of order.

The second point of order arises from the paragraph in "Erskine May" which says:

"If any stage of a bill is proceeded with when the notice has not been duly given, or the proper interval allowed,"—

I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to pay particular attention to the next words—

"or if notice is taken of any other formality, the proceeding will be null and void, and the stage must be repeated."

I accept that custom and practice weigh heavily in determining the decisions of the House, but I suggest that the custom and practice of promoters of private Bills in not giving Members adequate time to study their statement justifies our suggesting to the Government that they ought not to proceed with the Bill, particularly as hon. Members received the statement from the promoters only this morning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the statement which is often sent by promoters and their agents is purely a courtesy matter. There is no obligation in Standing Orders for them to do so.

As to the difference in various editions of "Erskine May", the hon. Gentleman is a sophisticated and, if I may say so without seeming to flatter him, learned Member. I am sure that he will make the appropriate moves to ensure that in future the "Erskine May" editions are consistent wherever they are available to hon. Members.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will recall that some two years ago the House ran into considerable difficulty with a private Bill dealing with the Felixstowe Dock and Harbour Board. That Bill divided the House on party political lines. Because of difficulties when the Bill went into Committee, a special Committee was set up to examine the procedure on private Bills.

Would it not be more appropriate for the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill to be delayed until that Committee has completed its deliberations? There is a grave danger that we are starting on another Bill which will involve almost all the same problems as the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. The Government seem to be sympathetic to this Bill because they have sandwiched it between two pieces of business on which there is a three-line Whip. The Government seem to be treating it as another Government Bill in the guise of private business.

We will have difficulty when we look for four hon. Members to sit in Committee in a semi-judicial role. The whole private Bill procedure is being brought into disrepute. The matter was rehearsed on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. There was a consensus in the House that a special Committee should be set up to examine the procedure. Therefore, it would be better to delay further consideration of this Bill until the report of the Committee is received and acted on, or we may have a rerun of the procedural difficulties on the earlier legislation.

I should have thought that even the promoters would want to avoid the difficulties and the expense that might be incurred. My hon. Friends would no doubt prefer to debate the merits of the Bill as a Government measure, going through the public Bill procedure, rather than using the difficult and arcane procedure for a private Bill.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not disregarding the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), but the point of order which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) wishes to raise may also be relevant.

Mr. Dobson: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is closely related to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett). The House, together with the House of Lords, established a Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure because of dissatisfaction with various aspects of the existing procedure, but in particular with Bills such as the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill which seek to obtain planning permission from Parliament rather than follow the usual procedure which more humble citizens have to follow of seeking consent from the local planning authority.

I understand that the Joint Committee has completed, or is about to complete, the taking of evidence and will report shortly. In the circumstances, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you might be prepared to postpone consideration of Bills through which promoters seek planning permission from us rather than from a local authority. To allow such Bills, including this one, to proceed is likely to bring the House into even more disrepute than the disrepute which rightly poured in on us because of the general conduct and the proceedings on the infamous Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, which led to the setting up of the Joint Committee.

The evidence that has been presented to the Joint Committee in this parliamentary Session is not available to hon. Members, but the 1986-87 Joint Committee, which unanimously recommended that in this Session of Parliament we should establish a new Joint Committee to consider the matter further, received evidence from such organisations as the Ramblers Association, the Countryside Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Open Spaces Society, all of whom argued that promoters of private Bills should in future be required to obtain planning permission from their local authority before coming to the House——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With respect, the hon. Gentleman knows that we cannot now go over all the matters which we hope the Joint Committee will examine. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to a point of order with which I can deal.

Mr. Dobson: Even at this late stage, although the Bill is set down for consideration now, as it raises all the issues which caused so much concern before and which seem likely—so I am told—to result in a unanimous recommendation from the Joint Committee that planning permissions by Parliament shall not be permitted in future by way of private Bills, and as there is an abundance of other private Bills which do not seek planning permission, I ask whether you would be prepared to abandon the business tonight. It is premature for us to consider it, and it would be ridiculous and damaging for us to go through with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must tell the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) that I have neither the authority nor the power to do what they propose. The matters which they have raised can be taken into account in debate. Both hon. Gentlemen seem to be anticipating a debate upon which we have not yet embarked, and equally anticipating its outcome. It might be sensible to await the outcome.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) for drawing attention to the fact that the Joint Committee has been sitting and has, I understand, been doing excellent work. I hope that it will soon be in a position to make recommendations. In the meantime, any right hon. or hon. Member who has proposals to make to the Joint Committee should do so before it completes its deliberations.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Because of your special position in this matter, would it be true to say that the Committee will change this archaic procedure if representations are made privately—that is right and proper, as you say—and if, at times such as these, representations are seen to be made by hon. Members on both sides of the House? The Government have been able to use this system of private Bills for what could be public Bills in a fashion——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I alone accept responsibility for the setting down of private business. It is entirely my responsibility. The other business set down for the same day is a matter for the other authorities of the House. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the previous debate was on an Opposition day. The business was set down by the Opposition. We cannot now seek to replicate matters that have been considered by the Joint Committee.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not want to draw you into my point of order, but I recognise that you, as Chairman of Ways and Means, are responsible for putting the Bill on the agenda and having it considered tonight. However, putting that aside, I smell a rat. You must hear my point of order.

The Secretary of State for Energy, that silver-haired and silver-tongued gentleman who stands at the Dispatch Box when we debate energy matters, is knocking around in the precincts of the House. I know what he is here for. We have been set up. I know what the Bill means and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as a Yorkshire man, know what it means. There is something going on here, and I do not like what I smell.

The Government Chief Whip is present. He does not often attend debates on private Bills. The Government are on the move and backing this Bill to push it through. They have a payroll vote tonight. They have done that before, and they are doing it again tonight—make no mistake about it.

I do not want to fall out with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I simply want to say that there is a rat running in this Chamber. That is what it is all about. So far as the Government are concerned, the Bill is——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman a good run, but he has not come to a point of order for me. All this business of rats and smells is not the responsibility of the Chair.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have some knowledge of the matters under discussion, although not of the substance of the Bill. My hon. Friends are right to smell a rat. They also smelt a rat in connection with the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, and they were right to do so. With that Bill, the company was eventually forced to offer a champagne party in the House.

I was a member of the Committee that considered that Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and you were most helpful and gave us a great deal of advice. I remember that well because I was profoundly worried about the pressure that was being put on hon. Members considering the Bill. There was no doubt that the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company, which I believe was at that time paying about £60,000 a year towards——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady knows that we cannot keep running back to that Bill. She need not remind me about it. I shall never forget it. However, we should now be dealing with the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill.

Mrs. Clwyd: I am a member of the Joint Committee that is considering the reform of the procedure. By the summer we will have produced a report suggesting various reforms. It would, of course, be improper for me to reveal the contents of that report, and I am sure that the House would not expect me to do so. However, I do not think that I shall be stepping out of line if I say that we have taken a great deal of evidence from those who profit from the procedure and from those who are concerned about the abuse of the procedure and believe that it should more properly be the substance of a planning inquiry and not be brought in through the back door, as so often happens.

You will remember that Disraeli—perhaps I should say that you will not remember——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With respect, I do not see how Disraeli can be brought into a point of order.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we should let the hon. Lady conclude her point of order.

Mrs. Clwyd: As I said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I would not want to reveal the contents of the report to Parliament, but there is no doubt that many people are worried about the misuse of the present procedure. In 1841 Disraeli said that the procedure should be reformed. It has taken almost 150 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady knows better than anyone in the House that we have set up machinery to do precisely what she is urging should be done. Perhaps we should now allow another hon. Member to speak.

Mr. Barry Porter: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have all had a little fun, but Opposition Member's tactics are clear. Is it not time to ensure that we proceed with this important debate, as it is in your power to do? Although I am always willing to listen to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), I should much prefer to hear her views on this matter in private. Although this is amusing, there are people in the Gallery listening to the debate who wish to hear the essence of the debate and the detailed arguments, rather than the comic procedure that we have had to put up with so far.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is right.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Under the Transport Act 1981, the former British Transport Docks Board, which is a nationalised undertaking——

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a genuine point of order on which I seek your ruling. It is related to Member's interests.

Under Standing Order No. 120, which governs the conduct of private business, hon. Members serving in Committee on an opposed private Bill must sign a declaration that they have no personal or constituency interest in the matter. The Bill is asking us to take over in part the functions of the local planning authority.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must know that the Second Reading motion has not even been moved yet, let alone decided upon. These are matters of which the House is well aware. I think the House will ensure that the Standing Orders are complied with when, if the Bill receives a Second Reading, a Committee is set up. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman ought to defer such a point of order until it becomes relevant.

Mr. Dobson: I was referring to the procedure governing the Committee, because it is an indication that Parliament, in its wisdom, is concerned about the declaration of interests generally. We do not need a Second Reading debate to tell us—it is spelt out on the face of the Bill—that we are being asked to give planning permission. What I am asking you to do, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is to rule that, as Parliament requires that hon. Members must, when they talk on these matters, declare their interests publicly, in these peculiar circumstances——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot precede every debate in the House with a rehearsal of the relevant Standing Orders and the expression of the hope that hon. Members who take part will comply with the Standing Orders. We assume that hon. Members, being honourable and intelligent, will comply with the Standing Order. Points of order become relevant when there is a breach of those Standing Orders.

Mr. Michael Brown: Although Associated British Ports is owned by a holding company——

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that we have heard sufficient points of order. We have had 30 minutes of points of order and I am not prepared to take any more at this stage.

Mr. Brown: Associated British Ports has, since its privatisation, established for itself——

Mr. Bermingham rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was called at the very beginning of the time spent on points of order. I am not prepared at this stage to take any further points of order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not persist in challenging my ruling.

8.3 pm

Mr. Brown: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Since its privatisation, Associated British Ports has established an excellent record of profitability, growth and well-planned investment. I served with the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on the Standing Committee which considered the Transport Bill in 1981. The 1981 Act brought Associated British Ports into existence. I remember the hon. Gentleman rightly making a lot of play of his opposition to the transfer of the old British Transport Docks Board into a private company because he felt that the change would starve ABP of investment.

I am delighted to be able to advise the hon. Gentleman that the ports of Immingham and Grimsby, which I have the pleasure to represent—in conjunction with the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—have, since being in the hands of ABP, gone from strength to strength. In 1987-88, about 30·9 million tonnes of cargo passed through Immingham. The hon. Gentleman, and his colleagues who represent the Opposition on transport matters, will recall that section 9 of the Transport Act 1981 requires ABP to provide such port facilities as it thinks necessary.

Mr. Redmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall not give way at this stage as it is only right that I should put the arguments in favour of the Bill on the record.

Part I is formal and is in well-precedented terms. It deals with definitions and incorporates, with modifications to suit local conditions, provisions found in public Acts which are usually applied by private Acts.

Part II would empower ABP to acquire compulsorily land or rights inland to construct the proposed works, which are in part III.

Part III seeks the authority of Parliament to construct marine works. This is the central purpose of the Bill. ABP wants to construct port facilities which are perceived to be needed to cater for the continuing trend towards larger and more cost-effective vessels.

Mr. Redmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: Perhaps I may set out the main purpose of part III first, as I suspect that it is on that that the hon. Gentleman will want to express a view.

Associated British Ports must provide for the new larger vessels if it is to remain competitive. Because the works are to be constructed in tidal water, Parliament's consent, as opposed to the local authority's consent, is required. Clause 8 sets out the proposed works, and clause 16 describes the proposed extension of the harbour limits at Port Talbot.

Works 1, 2, and 3 are intended to create a new facility for dry bulk cargo in the river Humber near Immingham, which is in my constituency. Work 1 comprises a jetty and jetty head. Work 2 is a secondary jetty designed to give additional access to the jetty head. Work 3 consists of reclamation landwards of the jetty head to provide additional back-up land in line with the anticipated increase in use of the jetty complex.

The port of Immingham is one of the busiest and most successful in the country. It currently handles some 30·9 million tonnes of traffic each year. That very success sometimes leads to congestion in our enclosed dock system. Many of the cargoes that are presently handled in the enclosed dock could be handled more efficiently if the proposed jetty were built.

Mr. Hardy: The hon. Gentleman says that there is congestion in the port and I would not dispute that. Will he confirm, however, that the Humberside Port Owners Association is not in favour of the Bill?

Mr. Brown: I am not able to confirm or deny that. The point of the work, however, is to overcome the problem of the constraint of lock gates. The purpose of the Bill is to enable larger ships which carry dry bulk cargoes to be handled without the constraints of the enclosed dock. The congestion that sometimes arises is caused by the dock gates, and a jetty would get over the problem.

The cargo that ABP anticipates could be handled are pyrites, ferrous sulphate, clay, iron ore, sand, rutile, illmenite, soda ash, petroleum coke, coal, titanium slag, grain and ferro alloys. I am aware that some hon. Members on both sides of the House are worried about the Bill, but I shall try first to express my views and those of the promoters on the technical aspects of the Bill. Some hon. Members may not have had an opportunity to consider them.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Do I take it that the hon. Gentleman is talking about a jetty which will be subjected to the full range of tidal movements?

Mr. Brown: Yes. That is one of the good things about the Bill. With dock gates, the tides sometimes constrain orderly working of the port. A tremendous project is proposed.

The work would provide room in the enclosed dock for a greater volume of cargoes which can be handled suitably only in dock. It would also provide a unique dry bulk facility out in the river for larger vessels. ABP advises me that it is confident that the new facilities would enable expensive trans-shipment to continental ports to be dispensed with as larger vessels could sail from foreign destinations direct to the new jetty terminal in the Humber.

Opposition Members may feel that the work might help foreign imports of which they do not approve. If the Bill is defeated, however, large bulk vessels will have to go, as they increasingly have to already, to the port of Rotterdam and break down their cargoes into much smaller boats, which would come to wharves outside the national dock labour scheme. Opposition Members know what problems that would present for traffic and villages.

Given the nature of the debate that we had earlier on the ten-minute Bill, it must surely be agreed that if there is to be investment in ports such as Hull, Grimsby and Immingham and large ports such as Liverpool, we must encourage port facilities to be concentrated where we have put the infrastructure. We do not want large cargoes going to Rotterdam, being broken down and sent to small wharfs.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I should like to clarify the hon. Gentleman's position on the Bill. According to the January-February edition of Anti-Apartheid News, the hon. Gentleman has connections with an organisation called the Office of the South African Coal Industry, which promotes imports of South African coal. According to The Times of 5 April 1988, the hon. Gentleman was part of a recent Conservative party delegation to South Africa which called for the ending of sanctions against imports of South African coal. Are those reports true? If so, who paid for the trip to South Africa? Is the hon. Gentleman actively involved in promoting the importation of South African coal? Does he get paid for so doing?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman asks a perfectly proper question, but he should have done his homework and referred to the Register of Members' Interests. If he had done so, he would have seen that I have a nil declaration. I have no financial interests, apart from a small income from Yorkshire Television and The Guardian. I have no financial connection with any other business whatsoever.

I freely and proudly confirm that I have had the opportunity to see many bulk terminals around the world, as one would expect of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes. I have seen the Richards Bay terminal near Durban, and I freely confirm that I was a guest of the Chamber of Mines in South Africa. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the Register of Members' Interests, he will see that those matters are declared.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No. I shall not give way, because I must make progress.

Work No. 4 describes a proposed quay that is intended to provide berths in the Great Ouse river at King's Lynn. This is building on success, for, although King's Lynn port is small, it is very busy and primarily handles grain, agricultural exports and timber and steel imports. It handles other traffic, including containers, cars, scrap metal, coal and coke. The new berths would enable larger ships to call at the port. At present, all the available facilities for cargo handling are located inside the enclosed docks and the size of vessel is limited by the entrance lock. It is envisaged that traffic such as grain exports and animal feed imports will use the new berth.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): My hon. Friend is aware that last year was the best ever for the port of King's Lynn. It is a thriving, thrusting, go-ahead port. The main problem is that there are two enclosed docks, which greatly restrict the length and width of vessels that are able to enter it. The riverside quay is essential for the expansion of the port to attract the larger, wider and longer vessels. Is my hon. Friend aware that the overwhelming majority of the people who work in King's Lynn dock and the Transport and General Workers Union, which represents most of the dockers who work there, are completely behind the Bill? Is my hon. Friend aware that if some Opposition Members succeed in sabotaging the Bill, my constituents, whose jobs depend on this measure, would regard their behaviour with dismay?

[Mr. Henry Bellingham]

Does he agree that those Opposition Members' attempts at sabotage are hypocritical and that they do not care about jobs in East Anglia and in constituencies such as mine?

Mr. Brown: I confirm that the Transport and General Workers Union has been solidly behind these proposals, which will be of much benefit to my hon. Friend's constituency. It is estimated that the proposed works will cost about £4 million and, as my hon. Friend rightly said, the additional provision is essential to the success of the King's Lynn port. I hope that Opposition hon. Gentlemen will listen to the debate and be convinced of the reasons why they should vote for the Bill. Thus far, I do not think that anything out of order has taken place.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have listened to the hon. Gentleman. Silverdale quarry in my constituency will be gravely affected by the Bill. The hon. Gentleman persists in addressing his remarks to hon. Gentlemen. He has not once directed his remarks to me.

Mr. Brown: I apologise profusely to the hon. Lady.

As hon. Ladies and Gentlemen will be aware, part IV of the Bill—this might have been of interest to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) had she been present—relates to provisions for Port Talbot. Clause 15 sets out the various provisions relating to Port Talbot and clause 16 extends the geographical limits of the harbour. This provision is required so that the dredged approach channel may be extended, lighted, buoyed and subject to the harbour master's jurisdiction. It is intended to ensure the safety of shipping in the area.

Port Talbot tidal harbour is a specialised facility which was constructed to allow the British Steel Corporation to bring in essential raw materials at a suitable deep-water harbour, conveniently placed for the steel works at Margam and Llanwern. The intention is to deepen and lengthen the dredged channel forming the approach to the tidal harbour so that the BSC may use larger vessels, thereby leading to economies of scale to make it more competitive against foreign manufacturers. I am sure that every hon. Gentleman and hon. Lady who represents a steel-producing constituency in south Wales will join me in the Aye Lobby. This is a major beneficial provision for the steel industry in south Wales.

At present, the annual tonnage of raw materials handled at Port Talbot is 7·5 million, of which iron ore amounts to 5·6 million. The largest vessel used at present has a capacity of only 100,000 tonnes, and it is expected that the improved channel will enable the use of vessels that carry up to 150,000 tonnes.

Part V contains a standard protective provision for the Crown, which is normal in Bills of this kind. Part VI deals with all the works and, in clause 18, places a time limit of 10 years on the proposed development for the purposes of class XII of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman is gabbling through a prepared brief. "Erskine May" says that printed notes are available by way of guidance for a speaker, but reading straight from notes is not permitted. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will adjust his speaking rate and debate the matter rather than gabble a prepared brief at us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In the hallowed phrase, hon. Members are allowed to refer to copious notes.

Mr. Brown: I am anxious to make progress, because I am aware that the Bill evokes a certain amount of passion among Opposition Members. I am acutely aware of the fact that many hon. Members wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have a responsibility on behalf of the promoters—and as the hon. Member whose constituency will benefit from the provisions of the Bill—to set out the technical matters that the Bill raises, as well as other matters that may touch on the constituencies of other hon. Members.

Clause 19 requires Associated British Ports to pay all the expenses of the promotion of the Bill and enables it to do so out of revenue. These clauses are standard provisions that are normal in a private Bill.

Mr. Redmond rose——

Mr. Brown: I should like to press on because I have a duty to the House to make some progress.

I shall refer to those who rightly petitioned against the Bill—it was within their rights. Eleven petitions against the Bill were deposited, and they fall into two groups. The first group, which numbers five petitions, consists of companies or bodies making specific points aimed at the protection of their interests in the locality of the Immingham and King's Lynn works. Those petitioners are the Anglian Water Authority, Calor Gas Limited, Conoco Limited, Humber Oil Terminals Trustee Limited jointly with Associated Petroleum Terminals (Immingham) Limited and, finally, the British Coal Corporation. All those bodies have legal interests in installations at close proximity to the proposed works, for example, sea defence works, jetties, conveyor systems and so on. Consultations and negotiations with the petitioners are well advanced and a great deal of progress has been made with ABP. As ABP readily acknowledges that it must indemnify legitimate interests that may be adversely affected, for example, if the approach to a neighbouring berth were to suffer additional siltation, it is fully expected that, with one exception, settlement will have been reached with the petitioners by the time the Bill is considered by a Committee in the House.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No, because there is one petitioner that I think the hon. Gentleman would wish me to deal with, which may affect his constituency and several others in Nottinghamshire.

Protection will be given by the ABP to the Department of Energy, which owns a jetty upstream of the proposed works at Immingham. Consultations have taken place with the Health and Safety Executive to make certain that the proposed works fully meet all safety regulations that are relevant to the busy industrial area of Immingham and to the river Humber, which is Britain's busiest waterway.

I mentioned one exception to the hope of a settlement with the petitioners that I named. It concerns British Coal, which petitioned seeking protection for its neighbouring port installations and with which it is expected full agreement will be reached for those installations. However, British Coal's petition contains, in paragraph 21, a more fundamental objection to the Bill, which is in line with the objections being made by the other group of petitioners to which I shall now refer.

I shall refer to those petitioners, if you will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as political petitioners because their petitions are purely political and have nothing to do with the technical aspects of the works that I have described. [Interruption.] I do not say that in any derogatory sense. I make it clear that I fully accept that the petitioners are perfectly entitled to petition, and they have exercised their right. Those petitioners are the National Union of Mineworkers, the Union of Democratic Mineworkers——

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it correct for the hon. Gentleman to refer to those petitioners as political, by which he means the Coalfield Communities Campaign and the National Union of Mineworkers, but to refer to the Transport and General Workers Union as supporting the Bill? Surely that is unfair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a legitimate point for debate, but it is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Brown: I should like to make it absolutely clear that, when I use the word "political", I use the word with a small "p" and in no sense in a derogatory way.

Mr. Allen: If the hon. Gentleman is expressing concern about petitioners and the views of those who may object to the Bill, why has he chosen to pilot it through the House rather than go through the normal planning permission process with a full public local inquiry, so that all those whom he calls political could put a full case in public and perhaps have their view heard by a judge? A decision could be made at a proper public inquiry after all the issues had been discussed rather than the hon. Gentleman trying to sneak the matter through in this way.

Mr. Brown: I should have thought that if we were to rely on the other method by which planning permission can be given, there would be far less opportunity than there is under the private Bill procedure for Opposition Members and petitioners to make their case.

On occasions, I have objected to private Bills and I have served on a private Bill committee, and I have followed private business from the point of view of promoters and petitioners, so if the hon. Gentleman has been in the House for as long as me—I have been here for nine years now—he will realise that under that procedure there is a tremendous scope to ensure that petitions are fully heard and adjudicated on in a much fairer way, from the point of view of the petitioners, than under normal planning procedures, which might involve a local borough council or a county council. I should have thought that this was a much better way to ensure that those who object to the Bill have the opportunity to have their say.

Those are the petitions that it is difficult for Associated British Ports to meet. Hon. Members who have blocked the Second Reading of the Bill are doing so on the same ground as that stated in the second group of petitions that I listed. That is that the proposed works at Immingham and King's Lynn and, indeed, the proposed improvements to the harbour at Port Talbot, are intended for or at any rate could be used for the importation of foreign coal. The NUM petition states flatly that, for that reason, the Bill should not be allowed to proceed.

The other political petitioners say that the Bill should not be allowed to proceed unless safeguards are inserted to prevent the consequences that they foresee. The only way in which ABP could go ahead and construct the works, and yet satisfy those petitioners, would be by binding itself never to accept any imported coal through the new works. Of course, that is not possible for any commercial body. ABP's perceived function is to provide and operate modern efficient port facilities to meet market demands and to be free to compete for all traffic, whether inward or outward bound, including coal, or any other commodity.

I stress that the proposed port facilities at Immingham are not simply for imports. Ports and port industries have two purposes: they are for exports as much as for imports. Hon. Ladies and hon. Gentlemen would do well to remember that it was only a short time ago, just before the mining dispute in 1984, that some 5 million tonnes of British coal were exported from the port of Immingham, perhaps from the mines in constituencies represented by Opposition Members. I remind hon. Ladies and hon. Gentlemen that from the British Coal press release just two days ago—they can take heart from it—it is clear that the present collapse in the price of world coal is unsustainable. The world price of coal is likely to rise. As a consequence of the efficiency of our mining industry, and probably in the mid-1990s, when the jetty facilities at Immingham are completed, it is likely that British Coal will be in the market for exporting, and it will need port facilities to do so. The Bill provides for those facilities.

I stress to hon. Ladies and hon. Gentlemen that the purpose of the Bill is to recognise that there are times when British Coal as well as British Steel has required port facilities to export its commodities. It was only a few years ago, when I represented the steel constituency of Scunthorpe, that the BSC was concerned about imports taking away its home market. Now it is in the export business and it needs export outlets and growing port facilities.

Mr. Michael Welsh: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way on an important issue. He said that the facilities would be for all sorts of imports, and he was grateful for that. If all sorts of imports can come in, is the hon. Gentleman saying that it is possible for nuclear waste to be imported, and to be dumped in our constituencies? If he is saying that, does he agree with it? I do not. I ask the hon. Gentleman: does he?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that is of great concern to me. But I cannot imagine that many people in the United Kingdom will import nuclear waste. It is highly unlikely that many people will require the port facilities for that, but, theoretically, if someone wanted to import vast quantities of nuclear waste, he could use Immingham docks. He could use the docks without the Bill, but he might not be able to bring so much in, so I suppose that theoretically what the hon. Gentleman says is possible.

The opposition by the coal interests to the proposals contained in the Bill amounts to an attack on free trade. The coal interests are using a private Bill legitimately, but they are using it to make a political point. The conception and execution of an energy policy for the United Kingdom is a Government matter, and Opposition Members should not use opposition to a private Bill——

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): As I understand it —this is an opportunity for the hon. Gentleman to correct me and to enlighten the House—he travelled to South Africa with his expenses paid, hospitality given, and took part in discussions. Did he at any time discuss with the mining interests in South Africa the possibility of their exporting coal to this country? Did South Africa demonstrate that because of the changing situation regarding energy policies in this country there is a market for its coal? If the hon. Gentleman did take part in such a discussion, will he be precise about it? If he did not do so, will he make that clear to us?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is an assiduous and senior Member of the House. I thought that he would have done his homework, examined the Register of Members' Interests and seen my declaration that I visited South Africa as a guest of the Chamber of Mines, and that my accommodation and travel expenses were provided. There is no secret about that.

Mr. Leadbitter rose——

Mr. Brown: I now come to the other points that the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) referred to. I raised the issue while I was in South Africa and he will be interested in the answer. There is a punitive export rate on the South African rand. It is not practical, across the exchanges, for the South African coal industry to export coal to this country. The hon. Gentleman should be aware also that Britain is a member of the European Community, which has imposed sanctions on South African coal. I should have thought that he would recognise the safeguards that exist. He should know, as an hon. Member with great experience of the coal industry, that the South African coal industry is flat broke. It has no investment possibilities for exporting its product.

Mr. Leadbitter: Why did the hon. Gentleman go there?

Mr. Brown: I went there because I wanted to see the export coal terminal at Richards Bay in Durban, and on behalf of those hon. Members who may one day see the coal that is produced in the mines in their constituencies being afforded the same sort of exporting coal facility at the port of Immingham. I should dearly like to see a Richards Bay at Immingham, and not one in South Africa. That is why I invite Opposition Members to consider the points that I make. [Interruption.] It is sad that instead of greeting better port facilities as an opportunity to export coal mined in the United Kingdom, the petitioners, not only shrink from this opportunity but actively and by political means, seek a protectionist policy. It is as though they have neither the will nor the ability to compete with foreign coal producers.

I voted against joining the Common Market in 1975, but I realise that in 1992, for better or worse, we shall be a member of the single European market. Products will go to the port of Rotterdam and be broken down and sent to——

Mr. Illsley: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why he visited a coal export terminal at Richards Bay? How does he square that with his latest statement that the South African coal industry is flat broke and cannot export that coal? If that is the case, why does it have this export terminal?

Mr. Brown: Because it has been there for many years. Of course, their export markets are not Europe; they are the Pacific rim. I thought that the hon. Gentleman, with whom I serve on the Select Committee on Energy, would know that.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Brown: I give way for the last time.

Mr. Allen: When South Africa exports coal to nations other than Europe, is there a prohibition on that coal being traded on the spot market in Rotterdam or anywhere else and thus finding its way into British ports? If the hon. Gentleman did visit Richards Bay, why did he do so when it is an old, out-of-date, unused facility? I assumed that he would want to see a modern facility.

Mr. Brown: I visited the Richards Bay facility because it is one of the largest facilities in the world. If one represents the port of Immingham and wants to see that port thrive, one would go to that sort of facility. Whether one likes it or not, South Africa is in the coal business. South Africa is supplied by the same coal technology which supplies the mines which are represented by Opposition Members.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Brown: No, I am not going to give way any more. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and be able to make his own speech.

We have to accept that Britain will be part of a wider Europe in 1992, whether we like it or not. If we are to take advantage of that opportunity—as France will do under the Socialist President Mitterrand—we have to be better than other countries. We must ensure that there are port facilities. We must ensure that the dockers in my constituency play their part in sending British goods across to the continent and to other parts of the world. As I have explained, the powers sought by ABP are designed to meet the needs of its markets and the many customers who will use the new facilities.

If the exporters and importers of a nation which is proud of its free trade tradition are denied the use of facilities that they need because of the opposition of one vested interest, that will be a grave injustice. That is why I invite the House to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I offer my condolences to the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). On 5 May he wrote a letter to his hon. Friends asking them to support the private Bill tonight. When he moved the Bill, there were 10 of his colleagues on the Government Benches. The number reduced to seven at one stage. The number is now up to eight, if one includes the Minister. It seems that his letter did not carry a lot of weight. I wonder what it will be like in the Lobby at 10 o'clock, if there is a Division. Will his hon. Friends respond to his three-line Whip? Below the request in his letter for supporters to attend at 10 o'clock there are three lines.

There are one or two other points in the letter that I should mention. The hon. Gentleman has been more honest with the House than he was in his letter. He said that the major part of the Bill relating to Immingham is about coal and very little else. In the letter which he sent to his right hon. and hon. Friends he said that the port could be used for the importation of coal. Of course, he knows that it will be used for coal imports. That is why British Coal is one of the 11 petitioners against the Bill. It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman has not put British Coal in his list of political petitioners.

Mr. Michael Brown: That is because British Coal is petitioning to protect its port interests at the terminals.

Mr. Barron: I shall be mentioning some of British Coal's interests as contained in the literature that it has been sending to hon. Members. Its interests go further than the Immingham terminal that it is using. Its interests lie in my constituency as well as in other hon. Members' constituencies. In the letter of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes there is the sentence:

"In both cases, an essentially private enterprise development faces opposition from public sector vested interests."

The hon. Gentleman is saying that the Bill of the newly privatised Associated British Ports should be defended because it is a privatised port rather than for any other reason.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes referred to the petition from the National Union of Mineworkers containing the name of the president, Arthur Scargill. It is a great pity that the hon. Gentleman did not refer to the other political petitioners such as Calor Gas and Conoco Ltd. The hon. Gentleman mentioned his visit to South Africa. He should recall that it is recorded in the Register of Members' Interests that he visited America not too long ago as a guest of Conoco. Twice during his speech the hon. Gentleman said that with regard to his visit to South Africa we should look at the Register of Members' Interests—[Interruption.]

I consulted the Register of Members' Interests this afternoon. Four Conservative Members went on that delegation to South Africa and two of them registered that fact in the Register of Members' Interests. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes did not.

Mr. Michael Brown: It is registered there.

Mr. Barron: I have looked at the register twice and the hon. Gentleman's visit is not registered there.

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman telephones the office which compiles the Register of Members' Interests, he will learn that my visit is registered. I have a copy of the entry. I do not know when the volume which the hon. Gentleman examined was published. If he telephones—and I am surprised that he did not do that this afternoon because that is what I would have done—he will receive the full details.

Mr. Barron: It is very strange that I looked in the updated version kept in the Library, not in the Vote Office, and I saw that two of his hon. Friends who accompanied him on the visit registered in time for that fact to be entered in the updated copy in the Library. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes invited Opposition Members to look in the Register of Members' Interests. The hon. Gentleman is not registered in the register as having visited South Africa with that delegation.

It is true, as the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes rightly explained, that the South African Government discriminate against their own coal industry. On 5 April 1988 The Times carried an article which examined in some detail the visit made by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes and his three colleagues to South Africa as the guests of the South African coal mining industry. The article states, referring to the delegation:

"They also feel it should be supported in its opposition to the discriminatory legislation enforced by the South African government."

The hon. Gentleman is arguing for the South African Government to remove that discrimination which he claims prevents them from exporting coal to Britain. He went to South Africa to argue that and he came back here and argued that the South African Government should stop doing that presumably to open the gates for South African coal, without South African Government discrimination, to come into Britain.

If we pass the Bill, the consequences will be very grave for the regional and national interests. It has become obvious since the publication of the White Paper on privatising electricity that the only competition will exist through the price of coal for the generators. While the nuclear industry is cushioned, the coal industry will be challenged. The Bill is the first—unfortunately, it will not be the last—challenge to the British coal industry in current legislation.

It is obvious that the facilities will be used for importing coal and that the effects of such imports on the demand for and supply of indigenous coal products must be heeded. It is a well-known fact that present international coal prices are well below sustainable levels in the medium to long term. Although prices have increased recently, that has been offset by the increase in sterling against the dollar. In view of that, substantial coal imports through the Humber could close a minimum of 10 million tonnes of capacity in the midlands and Yorkshire coalfields which would in future prove economic against world prices. Imports would also interfere with British Coal's current cost reduction and restructuring and that is compounded by the uncertainties arising from the Government's privatisation. There is no certainty about the terms and conditions under which British Coal will supply the newly privatised electricity supply industry.

It is worth noting at this stage that no industry of that scale can sustain a coherent investment programme of future market projections during all that uncertainty. Because of that, importing coal at an unsustainably low price would not only reduce British Coal's sales and output, but would permanently damage areas that have already borne the brunt of a contracting industry.

Mr. Allan McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Has my hon. Friend seen the report in the Sheffield and Barnsley Star which contains a report from the Financial Times business section stating that 40 potentially profitable pits will be axed by 1990 if the Government encourage coal imports?

Mr. Barron: That is right. I hope that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes will listen to these implications and will stop talking to his friends.

[Mr. Barron]

The report to which my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) has referred is titled and was produced by the Financial Times business information service last Monday. It states:

"Much British deep-mined coal can compete well with imports in 1990—but by 1995 the mines should be competing so well as to restrict imports to the periphery of the power station market . . . By 1995 any savings made by an all-out import policy in 1990 would have disappeared and the electricity supply industry would be paying millions of pounds more for imported coal than by buying British . . . There is a severe risk that many deep mines which could compete with imported coal in 1995 will be closed by 1990 if the government encourage an early free-for-all on imports."

That is exactly what is happening with the Bill tonight.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Does my hon. Friend realise that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) is fully aware of the facts that he has given? Like me, the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has the privilege of being a member of the Select Committee on Energy and he heard expert witnesses expressing concern about the effects on the British coal mining industry arising from the privatisation of electricity and the threat of major imports of up to 30 million tonnes. That coal could not be imported without these new ports.

Mr. Barron: That is right. My hon. Friend has struck a true note. We all know what is behind the Bill.

I want to refer to the Bill's history. The Bill's promoters applied for EEC assistance under the integrated development operation programme for the region covering some of south Yorkshire and Humberside. That application was rejected because it was argued that to fund a project in one part of an area that damaged another was not within its scope and that refusal was perfectly correct as the coal mining areas of Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire will be dramatically affected by the Bill if it is carried through all its stages.

There are five coal mines in my constituency which supply between 80 per cent. and 95 per cent. of their production to one of four power stations——

Mr. Redmond: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it correct and in order for a Conservative Member to consult with members of the public who may have a vested interest in this discussion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am concerned only with what happens in the Chamber, and that is a difficult enough job without the hon. Gentleman inviting me to deal with something outside the Chamber.

Mr. Barron: The coal mines in my constituency supply coal to two generators in Yorkshire and two in Nottinghamshire. The terminal referred to in the Bill will threaten those collieries.

We are effectively being asked to add to the 19 per cent. unemployment level in the Rotherham and Mexborough travel-to-work area. We are being asked to threaten jobs in an area where 51·3 per cent. of the male unemployed have been claiming benefit for more than a year. In March, 4,310 young people were on Government schemes or seeking work through the Rotherham careers office. Between November 1987 and February 1988, only 55 full-time and three part-time vacancies were notified for the 4,310 young people seeking work in the area. In March, there were 499 unfilled vacancies at the jobcentre in the area which I represent and the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther). In other words, there was one vacancy for every 40 unemployed people.

The Bill would make matters worse in the interests of profit for a newly privatised electricity supply industry. It would not act in the national interest. In the past decade British Coal has reduced its work force by 60 per cent., and the work force has been reduced by over half in the past three years. More than 125,000 job losses have been the direct and miserable cost of the coal industry's restructuring. The price has been paid by the mining communities. What more can these communities realistically be expected to give if there are to be further cuts in their areas?

What is to be done for the thousands of young people who have no opportunity to work? Some of them have been unemployed for four, five or six years. Many have never had a job, and they would love to take one if the opportunity came their way. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes is giving us the opportunity to cause further job destruction by expanding the port at Immingham.

Mr. Michael Welsh: I agree with my hon. Friend's arguments on unemployment. Does he agree that it would be foolish to embark on an undertaking to bring minerals into this country when we have a 300-year supply of coal? Surely such importation would increase unemployment and ruin the balance of payments. Would it not be foolish to pay for imports when we can produce what is needed? Does my hon. Friend agree that the Bill should be rejected?

Mr. Barron: I concur with my hon. Friend's remarks. He will be aware of the damage that was caused to the balance of payments following the increase in oil prices in the early 1970s. That was a classic example. It seemed that we were prepared to cut off our noses to spite our faces. Warnings were issued by the British mining industry for many years that importing energy at such a high level was wrong. It was seen to be wrong when the price of oil on the world market increased fourfold in a short period.

I know that a three-line Whip has been sent to Conservative Members. They have been asked to support the Bill's Second Reading. Although there have never been more than 10 Conservative Members in the Chamber since the debate began, I suspect that we shall see more than 10 of them when the Question is put.

There is a strong rumour that the chairman of Associated British Ports has met the Minister to ensure that the Bill enjoys prime parliamentary time, that there will be a healthy vote in its favour, and that it will have some chance of success. It is a disgrace that it has been introduced in such a manner. It has been rushed through, and accompanying it is a flimsy letter from the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes that fails to deal with the problems that will arise in many areas. I note that the hon. Gentleman smiles. I am talking about Rother Valley, which is Labour controlled, and other areas that some of his hon. Friends represent. These areas will be under attack if the Bill is enacted and implemented.

Mr. Redmond: My hon. Friend has made a serious allegation. I hope that he will ask the Minister to give a categoric denial that the chairman of Associated British Ports has met the Minister or any departmental officials with a view to pushing the Bill through the House.

Mr. Barron: If the Minister intervenes in the debate, I hope that he will tell us whether the rumour to which I have referred is true. As I have said, it is strongly rumoured that there has been a direct approach to someone within the Department by the chairman of Associated British Ports.

I shall bring my remarks to a close as I am aware that others wish to participate in the debate. It may be that we shall not have sufficient time to complete our consideration of the Bill on Second Reading this evening because of the number of hon. Members who wish to speak. It may be necessary for the debate to be continued at a later date.

The communities that I represent, along with many that are represented by others in this place, have paid the price of restructuring, and it will be paid by future generations. These communities should be allowed to reap some of the benefits that should accompany increases in productivity. We are all aware of the increases in productivity that have been achieved in the coal industry over the past three years, and I want to ensure that the communities that I represent benefit accordingly. One way of ensuring that they do so would be to reject the Bill. Let us ensure that if there is a Division on Second Reading this evening there will be a majority against it.

If the Bill is given a Second Reading tonight and later is enacted, its effect will be to exploit our people and the peoples of other countries. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has visited South Africa and he has seen the exploitation in that country's coal mines. I urge him to change his mind and to join us in rejecting the Bill's Second Reading.

8.56 pm

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My intervention will be brief and will follow entirely traditional lines. The normal advice that is given to the House by all Governments, regardless of party, is that a private Bill should be allowed a Second Reading. That does not imply that the Government support it. It means that the Bill should be allowed to be considered in Committee so that it can be examined in detail on its merits. The promoter and sponsors can advance the case for it, and the petitioners can argue for amendment or rejection.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred to what he described as a strong rumour that I had met the chairman of Associated British Ports to have my arm twisted or my ear bent in receiving his views on why the Bill should proceed. I have not met the chairman of Associated British Ports in respect of the Bill. I have no knowledge of whether any other Minister or officials in the Department of Transport have done so. That has no bearing on what I have to say this evening.

I shall not comment on the Bill. All the arguments have been advanced for and against it.

Mr. Barron: If the Bill proceeds after its Second Reading tonight, will the Minister ensure that nobody else from his Department—perhaps even the Secretary of State himself—has met the promoters of the Bill, and will he make that information available at the Committee stage or at another opportunity?

Mr. Mitchell: Had I or my colleagues been persuaded by the chairman of Associated British Ports, we might have been expected to express a view that was favourable to the details of the Bill. I have been carefully telling the House that I am adopting the traditional stance of not commenting on the Bill or on the arguments that have been made for or against it. I merely urge the House to give the Bill a Second Reading, so that the case can be properly heard. The House owes that much to the promoters. My action is not meant to show support for the Bill, but reflects the Government's purely conventional and neutral position. It is on that basis that I hope the House will allow the Bill to make progress, so that it may be considered in greater depth at the Committee stage.

9 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The Minister tells the House that the Government, with their usual neutrality, have nothing to do with the Bill. I remind Conservative Members who have not turned up for this debate, important though it is, and also my hon. Friends, that the same Minister, during the progress of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, assured the House that the Government were strictly neutral. Yet during the course of the long evening when that Bill was debated the Prime Minister herself voted on it on at least seven occasions, thereby demonstrating that the Government's neutrality was as bogus on that occasion as is the Minister's pretence that the Government have no interest in this Bill.

I say to the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) that he would do himself a considerable favour if he would be less assiduous in trying to persuade the powers that be in the Government to arrange matters nicely for him. Conservative Members were in the House for a Whipped vote at 7 o'clock, and we know that they will be present again later tonight for another Whipped vote. We know that the sponsor of the Bill has written to his hon. Friends in such a way that it was described as a private three-line whip. That does not lead us to believe that there has been no jiggery-pokery with the Government's business managers.

Mr. Michael Brown: The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) should be aware that the time allocated for today's private business is not a matter for the Government, or for the Opposition, but is arranged on the instructions of the Chairman of Ways and Means. I make no secret of the fact that I have invited my hon. Friends by letter to consider the points that I have made, and I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) has written to every Conservative Member asking them to join the Opposition Lobby.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman surprises me, either with his innocence or his naivety. I agree that the allocation of private business is a matter for the Chairman of Ways and Means. However, if the hon. Gentleman is trying to persuade me that it was other than the Government's business managers who allocated the debate that is to take place after this Second Reading, he is out of his head. He knows as well as I do that it is the Leader of the House, in conjunction with the Chief Whip and the business managers of his party, who make sure that at the end of the day the Government govern. It is the Government's business managers who decide what business is transacted. Those same Government business managers ensured that Whipped business would be taking place after this private business, thereby guaranteeing that many of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends—and friends of apartheid—would be present to vote for the Bill.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): So far the hon. Gentleman has made no real argument against the Bill. It is not our fault that the Opposition changed the subject of today's debate and introduced contention after today's business was announced last week. The fact that Conservative Members are present to vote on certain issues should not surprise him. He should address himself more to the arguments relating to the Bill than to the business of the day.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) will forgive me if I do not always accept his advice on the content of my speeches or how I should present them. Having listened to the hon. Gentleman on many occasions, I find that I generally do better without his assistance. I shall not labour the point, but the hon. Gentleman is a little newer to the House than is his hon. Friend, and is a little duller. I shall try to explain again to him that it was the Government's business managers who allocated the business after this Second Reading, so guaranteeing that Conservative Members would be present in force tonight.

The Government, far from being neutral, are showing all the signs that they have shown in the past of wanting to support the Bill. The reason for doing so is simple, and it is the one given by my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron). The Bill is all part of the process of fattening up the CEGB for privatisation—fattening up revenues for the Government's coffers. It does not take an economic or mathematical genius to know that if the CEGB can operate with imported coal bought on the stock market—as it wants to—where prices, for this brief moment of history, are well below those of British Coal, it will be in a position to lower its costs and increase its prices. And the Government will be able to maximise their profits when privatisation of the CEGB takes place.

I am sure that many of my hon. Friends from the coal mining communities will make their points about the coal industry. They are better informed about it than I am. However, I shall make a few before moving on——

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Although it is a fiction that the Government maintain neutrality, there is a case for them not to operate that fiction and to ask us to move against the measure. The preamble to the Bill states:

"The purposes of this Act cannot be effected without the authority of Parliament".

That shows that the Bill is claiming that these things can be done only by means of a Bill of this kind. However, we know that planning permission being sought through the normal procedures from authorities in different parts of the country would be another way of achieving the Bill's aims. So the Bill is a fraud and the Government should take that into account when considering their attitude to it.

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend raises an important point, which the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes might want to consider. He told the House—surprisingly—that he thought this procedure was a better one for prosecuting a matter such as this. I have stated before that it would be far better if Parliament had nothing to do with these private Bills, which tend to be squalid little affairs. Accusations are often made—and justified—that Conservative Members are acting in the interests of some rather dubious groups, in this country or further afield.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has already been questioned about his links with the South African coal industry. If he would like to tell us how far his negotiations with that industry extend, he would do the House a favour. We would then be able to put his claims of disinterestedness to the test. At the moment they do not look good, in view of the accusations about his links with the South African coal industry.

Such issues, which may be hidden in this sort of procedure, would not be hidden if the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) of having proper planning mechanisms and local public inquiries were followed. In that way, local interest groups and people who would be affected could make clear their objections, which could be properly examined. That would be a more acceptable way of handling this.

We know that more than 100 Conservative Members who will be needed for the closure are secreted around the House, but the problem is that fewer than a dozen of them are present to hear the reasons that would justify, or not, their decision to vote for the Bill. That is why this procedure is objectionable to us. It fails to deal with the needs of those who petitioned against the Bill and, more generally, the needs of the nation. That is why the Government cannot escape their responsibility for such Bills. The Minister may tell the House that the Government's traditional posture on these issues is one of neutrality, but the Government do not always maintain such neutrality. The Minister, on many occasions, far from saying that the House should give a Bill a Second Reading so that the Standing Committee can get on with its examination of it, has made it clear, for instance, that the Government support the promoters of British Rail Bills.

It simply is not good enough for the Minister to pretend that the Government have no interest. Nor is it acceptable for the Minister to tell the House that the Government have no views on whether this development, which will have a major impact on British ports policy, is in the interests of the nation's ports or is an acceptable scheme and to say that the Government are neutral. It is not even acceptable for the Minister not to have a view on whether the petitioners' arguments are relevant. Several petitioners have raised substantive points and the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has failed to answer the criticisms that have been made.

In fairness, I should say that the hon. Gentleman has approached me on one issue, and I want to raise that with him now. One of the petitioners is Calor Gas, which has a storage facility which contains some 300 tonnes of liquid petroleum gas. I think that all hon. Members will accept that that is a considerable quantity of such potential danger——

Mr. Hardy: Horrifying.

Mr. Lloyd: For such a store to be put in jeopardy would be unacceptable to all hon. Members. Calor Gas has petitioned against the Bill because it is worried about the safety of its facility. When neither the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, the sponsor of the Bill, nor the Minister addresses that issue, but simply says that it can be dealt with at another stage when the petitioners can have their say is not good enough. The House would be negligent if it did not take such real anxieties into account on Second Reading.

Mr. Michael Brown: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's anxieties and I have consulted the promoters about them. I have been advised by them that they have met the Health and Safety Executive and the Glanford borough council, which is the planning authority, and a representative of Calor. They are pressing the Health and Safety Executive for a definitive statement to reassure Calor that it will not lose its consent as a result of ABP's activities.

Having advertised the Bill, ABP has had no adverse comments from the Health and Safety Executive and, until receiving the Calor petition, did not appreciate how anxious the company was. Calor and Coneco are customers of ABP, and it will want to do everything to reassure them because they are major customers and users of the facilities. I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept that, if the Bill receives its Second Reading and goes to a Private Bill Committee, such legitimate issues can be considered, with Calor as petitioners.

Mr. Lloyd: I do not find it reassuring that a company with such high credentials as we are told ABP has should sponsor a Bill for which it seeks a Second Reading in the House of Commons without having addressed fundamental safety issues. The hon. Gentleman can correct me if I am wrong, but my information is that ABP did not approach the Health and Safety Executive in an attempt to discover the position.

The hon. Gentleman's explanation is inadequate in another respect. It is not satisfactory if ABP's only reason for wanting to have the matter resolved is simply that it values two large commercial supporters with whom it has substantial dealings. Once again, the actions of the promoters of the Bill and the Government leave a lot to be desired.

The issue of that installation is fundamental, because Calor Gas says that its store will be within 50m of vessels that will be moored on the new jetty if it is built. That is sufficient to make it extremely worried about whether it would be allowed to continue operating at that jetty under existing regulations—the Health and Safety Executive guidance note GS40 on the loading and unloading of bulk flammable liquids and gases, and the API standard 2510 on design and construction of liquid petroleum gas installations. My hon. Friends and I would be the first to argue that if Calor Gas can no longer operate the installation in a manner compatible with safety, the facility must be closed down. If the building of the new jetty will make the liquid petroleum gas installation unsafe, it would be negligent of the House to fail to have the facility closed down.

Mr. David Mitchell: Perhaps it might help the hon. Gentleman and reassure the House to know that the Conoco and Calor Gas operation is a notified installation under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982, so the Health and Safety Executive will certainly be considering the matter if the Bill proceeds.

Mr. Lloyd: That is exactly the point. The House will, indeed, be considering the matter if the Bill proceeds. However, it is a fact of life that the HSE should have been approached by Associated British Ports before the Bill came before the House. It is certainly my clear understanding—the HSE can speak for itself—that the HSE feels considerable unease, to say the least, about the way in which the matter has been handled and the fact that it was not consulted by ABP before this stage. That should give us no cause to be happy about the way in which the Bill has been handled.

The installation is the single most important matter that has been raised because of the clear implications of 300 tonnes of liquid petroleum gas going up in flames, but there are other——

Mr. Mitchell: I want to reassure the hon. Gentleman ——

Mr. Barron: The Minister is defending the Bill.

Mr. Mitchell: No. I am simply trying to put it on record that if the Bill proceeds and the Health and Safety Executive feels that there is a risk, that body will be able to deal, not with this proposal, but with the risk item, which is the liquid gas installation and storage facility. The HSE has power to deal with that matter at its discretion.

Mr. Hardy: Will my hon. Friend comment on, and seek the Minister's further comments on, the fact that when we debated the Hampshire (Lyndhurst) Bypass Bill the Government were able to confirm to the House that the two public agencies responsible for advising them on that Bill—the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission—had given advice, even though they had then ignored it? In this case, at the same stage of the Bill's consideration, the Government cannot give us the advice of the public agency that should be responsible for giving advice. As the explosive capacity of liquid petroleum gas is horrific in its proportion and volume, it is remiss of the Government not to make available the sort of advice that was made available on previous Bills. As the Government have not provided that advice, will my hon. Friend suggest to the Minister, not only that he should abstain on Second Reading, but that he should ensure that his ministerial colleagues do the same?

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend gives the Minister some sensible advice. Clearly, the statutory body responsible, the HSE, has not been in a position to comment. It is amazing that the Government can remain neutral when they should have taken expert advice from the HSE. The Minister could then properly have informed hon. Members about whether the proposed development was inherently unsafe or whether it was acceptable and posed no threat to the gas storage installation.

Mr. Mitchell: With great respect, the hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. The Health and Safety Executive is not involved in the matters that are proposed in the Bill. That is not its responsibility. Its responsibility is to decide whether the gas installation should be allowed to continue if the Bill became law and the jetty was used. I make it absolutely clear that the Health and Safety Executive does not have a responsibility for the jetty that is proposed in the Bill. It does have a responsibility for the gas installation nearby. If it took the view that the gas installation was not acceptable in that close proximity, it would have powers to deal with the gas installation, but not with the jetty.

Mr. Lloyd: I am grateful to the Minister for his explanation of the technical process, and I agree with him that that is the formal logic. Nevertheless, that situation serves merely to highlight my anxieties. If the Minister is telling the House that the Government, in their neutral attitude to the Bill, are so laid back that they will not take seriously a threat to 300 tonnes of liquid petroleum gas until such time as the HSE has had the opportunity to find out whether vessels will ram the storage terminals, I must tell him that he should not be doing the job that he is doing tonight in the House.

Mr. Barron: Is my hon. Friend aware that Ian Greer Associates wrote to me this morning about the effect on the gas installation? The Minister seems to be defending the Bill. The letter says:

"The promoters have met Calor Gas but as of yet they have offered no amendment to the Bill or given an explanation which is satisfactory to Calor."

Indeed, it is believed that the results of the Bill will be the closure of the gas installation and will cost the jobs that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) says he wants to encourage in his constituency.

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend was kind enough to give me a copy of that letter. On this occasion Calor Gas has behaved in a completely reputable way. Obviously it has a commercial interest to defend, but it is also determined to defend its reputation as an operator that does not want to endanger the lives of hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people.

The Minister should have been able to tell the promoters of the Bill and Opposition Members that the Government can say definitively that the development does not jeopardise that installation, or alternatively that the Government cannot support the Bill tonight because the threat to the installation is so great that it risks devastation and loss of human life on a massive scale.

I shall now turn to another significant item raised by a petitioner against the Bill. The Anglian water authority, which is responsible for land drainage, water courses and effectively for the whole water system in the area of this development, has expressed grave doubts which could not be considered to be motivated by private gain or personal profit. Its doubts stem from the floods on the east coast in 1953. Although I am rather too young to remember that time, I am aware that there was considerable loss of life. As a result, at considerable expense, the Anglian water authority and its predecessor bodies managed to erect a system of sea defences which have protected that coast for all those years.

The Anglian water authority has expressed grave anxiety about the proposed developments by Associated British Ports. It believes that the developments will jeopardise the sea defences that it has provided. It believes that during the construction phase of the jetty, and later when the jetty has been established, it will so fundamentally alter the manner in which the water system works that it will threaten the sea defences and expose the constituency of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes and others to the devastating flooding that occurred on that coast 35 years ago.

Associated British Ports has completed a model of the development. Such a model should have existed long before now. Expert information in the form of mathematical and physical models should have been made available to all those concerned. The Minister of State ought to have been able to allay the fears of hon. Members by saying that there is no threat to the sea defences, as suggested by the Anglian water authority. The Minister has told us that he is neutral. He has also told the House that he is unable to provide expert information about liquid petroleum gas. Furthermore, the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes is unable to say whether there is a real threat to the sea defences in that area. This is a matter of such fundamental importance that one can say that the promoters have been negligent in promoting a Bill for which they have been unable to provide the appropriate information.

Mr. Allen: Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that 70 per cent. of the deep mine coal capacity in Nottinghamshire goes to power stations in the Trent valley? If a port with a capacity of 5 million tonnes is created, it will have a tremendously detrimental effect on the mining industry in Nottinghamshire and throughout the east midlands.

Mr. Lloyd: I have already made that point. One of the reasons for the Bill is that it provides the Government with a means of fattening up the CEGB for privatisation. An inevitable part of that process is the importation of cheap coal that can be bought at Rotterdam and elsewhere. It allows the CEGB to reduce its costs and increase its profits. It also allows this bankrupt Chancellor of the Exchequer to prop up Government expenditure, as he has done every year since he became Chancellor, with the proceeds of the privatisation that has ripped off the British public. In this case he will be ripping off the jobs of miners in the midlands and elsewhere, including those of miners in the constituencies of Conservative Members. I know that that worries at least one Conservative Member, and perhaps that is to his credit.

Miners' jobs are of critical importance. My hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) has this evening handed me a letter from people in his area. They are anxious about the knock-on effect in the diminished south Wales coalfields if they come under pressure from the midlands coalfields because their coal is displaced by imported coal.

The problem over the 300 tonnes of liquid petroleum gas is of such devastating importance, if this development gets it wrong, that the House would be failing in its duty if it did not take the matter on board. The undermining of the sea defences on the east coast is another matter of such importance that the House would be failing in its duty if it adopted a position of benign neutrality, as urged by the Minister of State. I urge my hon. Friends and also the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes to follow the advice of my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley and reject the Bill. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes should consider whether he ought to say to the promoters that, as that information is not available, he is not prepared to vote for the Bill.

9.29 pm

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): The Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill is an innocent title for a Bill which would more honestly reflect its aims if it were called the Destruction of the British Coal Industry Bill. As with most cover titles, nothing is revealed until we turn the pages and find the hallmark of the international coal producers whose covetous eyes are on the British coal market. Their initial aim is to kill off the indigenous supply and reap their reward by blackmailing their customers into paying their inflated price on a take-it-or-freeze option.

However, one of the limitless virtues of the Government is not leaving the country open to internal or external blackmail. We well remember the hike in energy prices in 1973 as a result of another international cartel operation. The resulting largesse stimulated a flood of development, led by the oil companies, of opencast coal mines in the lowest-cost reserves anywhere, however remote, in the world, the favourite countries being Australia, South Africa and Colombia. Their plan was to meet the extra demand for coal worldwide, but the optimistic forecast did not materialise because of the industrial recession and the completion of nuclear power stations ordered in the 1970s. That left the speculating producers with a huge surplus of unwanted coal, their predicament being heightened by the collapse of oil prices 18 months ago. Solutions had to be found to salvage their investments.

The first solution was to mothball mines where possible. The second was to use the supermarket technique of loss leaders to attract customers. Alas, from which countries would they come? The United States of America? No. United States power stations are persuaded not to buy foreign coal. In 1986, out of a total market of 630 million tonnes, only 1 million tonnes were imported into the United States. France has protection, but needs very little coal since 78 per cent. of its energy requirements come from non-coal power stations. West Germany, the most successful country in Europe, has a fully protected coal industry. Britain, with its 100 million-tonne market, has no legal protection and is an obvious choice for coal dumping. Ports capable of handling super coal tankers are needed; hence our debate.

The supporters of the Bill have told the House of its virtues in job creation, cheaper coal and cheaper electricity but have glossed over its real intention—the destruction of Britain's successful and profitable coalfield in Nottinghamshire by offering coal at prices below the cost of production to Nottinghamshire's existing five 2,000 MW power stations, with a further new one to be built alongside an existing station at West Burton. The present international coal prices, valued in sterling, are substantially below the levels sustainable in the medium to long term. The position is endorsed in the document published recently by Coopers and Lybrand called "Coal in Crisis". If, during the period of unsustainably low prices, substantial coal imports were to come into the Humber, they could threaten with irreversible closure a minimum of 10 million tonnes of capacity in the midlands coalfields.

Mr. McLoughlin: Does my hon. Friend agree that this will also threaten the great investment which has been put into British Coal by the Government? Rather than wanting to see an end to British Coal, the Government have shown overwhelming commitment in the amount of investment, in particular in the areas where the miners stood strong and steadfast behind their right to work during the inflicted 12-month coal strike.

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend has put the point well. I agree that the Government have honoured their commitment to the coal industry.

Recent prices are not sufficient to earn profits for the main coal exporting mines. A return on capital has been put off by the biggest of the new mines in an effort to drive out the competition. The Bill reminds me of the Trojan horse—innocent looking but devastating in its effect. The aim is to kill British Coal's goose, the Nottinghamshire coalfields, where 50 per cent. of British Coal's profits are generated, and the remaining coalfields will die by themselves. How else can the international coal producers capture a market other than by loss leader prices? This raises a fundamental question, do we really want electricity supplies to be in the hands of foreigners, or do we support British Coal and the miners who have brought about such a radical transformation to their industry in the three years since the strike?

The wages and productivity deals freely negotiated by the Union of Democratic Mineworkers and subsequently imposed on members of the National Union of Mineworkers have been the basis for productivity in British Coal rising by 60 per cent. and coal prices at power stations being reduced by 22 per cent. in real terms. Collieries are continuing to improve their performances. At present rates of improvement, they will be highly competitive by 1992. However, there is a period before then when many will be vulnerable to subsidised coal imports. It would be tragic to threaten the progress that British collieries are making for the very short-term gains from imported coal.

Mr. Allen: Will the hon. Gentleman apply his remarks to collieries in his constituency where a number of my constituents worked, notably Linby colliery, which was closed recently, Babbington colliery, which was closed two years ago, and Hucknall colliery, which was closed a year ago? All those collieries are either within or on the borders of the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Surely that is a product not of any ports Bill, but of the whole economic philosophy of the Government, as directed towards the mining industry? Where was the hon. Gentleman when those closures occurred?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman should do his homework better. Hucknall colliery had £100 million of taxpayers' money expended on it and, when the twelfth seam of coal, which was expected to contain 25 million tonnes, was reached, there was nothing but sandstone. How does he expect to keep a business open with no coal? That is why it closed. It was closed with the agreement of the people concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are digressing from the subject of the debate.

Mr. Stewart: The threat to the progress made by British collieries has been endorsed in "Coal on the Market" by Michael Prior and Gerard McCloskey, which states:

"Much British deep-mined coal can compete well with imports in 1990—but by 1995 the mines should be competing so well as to restrict imports to the periphery of the power station market . . . By 1995 any saving made by an all-out import policy in 1990 would have disappeared and the electricity supply industry would be paying millions of pounds more for imported coal than by buying British . . . There is a severe risk that many deep mines which could compete with imported coal in 1995 will be closed by 1990 if the government encourage an early free-for-all on imports."

The UDM has always accepted fair and unfettered competition, but this potential threat to Nottinghamshire would be catastrophic. Already, restructuring has seen 15,000 men leave the industry with six pit closures. Today British Coal in Nottinghamshire employs 27,000 people, generating over £320 million to the local economy. It pays £5·6 million in rates and spends £130 million on goods and services, as well as being the largest industrial employer in the country.

The coal industry and its employees also generate further employment in the service sector and manufacturing industry. When the country faced a shutdown of the coal industry in 1984, it was the Nottinghamshire miners and their families who put their industry and country first. Since then, they have led the industry into a new era of successful industrial relations and productivity with one objective in mind—to stay in business. If the House rejects the Bill, they will do just that and the country's dividends will be tenfold.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): One of the most significant points to emerge from the debate is that the Bill may be defective because the proposed site will be very close to the Calor Gas undertaking. It is unfortunate that, when trying to give the House information in response to a legitimate inquiry, the Minister appeared to say, "If there is a difficulty, Calor Gas will have to move to allow the port to proceed." We have probably identified why the Bill should not have been presented to the House. It is certainly defective in regard to Immingham.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) put me in mind of the presidential election campaign fought by Barry Goldwater, the Republican candidate, whose friends thought up a phrase to help him which ran, "In your heart you know he's right." The hon. Gentleman tried to tell us that, in our hearts, we know he is right. The Democrats thought of another phrase, however. They came up with, "In your guts, you know he's nuts." We have an absurd proposition before us.

The Bill involves substantial sums of money—£34·5 million has been mentioned. I suppose that this is not the time to ask where the money is coming from, but it is fair to ask whether it is a wise investment. Some of us are worried about the impact of the proposed works on employment in other industries such as coal and railways.

I must protest at the limitation on the time available to debate this important issue. Many of my hon. Friends want to speak, but will be unable to do so. This is not a local issue, but a national one. We have to ask why the Bill exists. We have also to ask about the background to our debating it here.

The Bill covers quite a bit of country. It goes from Immingham in Humberside to King's Lynn in Norfolk and Port Talbot in West Glamorgan. It is estimated that the works at Immingham will cost £13·5 million and that those at King's Lynn will cost £4 million. I do not know whether it is a defect in the Bill or an attempt to keep us in sublime ignorance, but, although Port Talbot is mentioned, there is no estimate of what the works there will cost. The money involved in the Bill will be far more substantial than the figures that we have been given.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have little doubt that the Bill has been sprung as a result of the Government's proposal to privatise the electricity supply industry. No doubt to get backing for his privatisation proposals, the Secretary of State for Energy announced that he would present no opposition to the purchase of foreign coal in preference to British coal. The Secretary of State calls that choice and working for the market. Coal importers all over the world cannot believe their luck to have such a push-over as the Secretary of State and this Government. We are aware of the history of the Department of Energy. Its terms of reference are to liquidate the nation's assets.

Substantial sums of money are involved in the Bill, so it is only right and proper to ask whether the proposed investment is worthwhile. It is geared, as the sponsor of the Bill confessed, to provide a facility for importing foreign coal. Millions of pounds worth of foreign investment is identified in the Bill, but does it make economic sense to accept that investment when by doing so we shall liquidate billions of pounds that have already been invested in the British coal industry, plant manufacturing industry and jobs? I shall explain what I mean when I talk about liquidating billions of pounds worth of investment. The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) came close to answering the question when he said that it is nonsense to liquidate the billions of pounds that have been invested in the mining industry.

We recently had a debate on the coal industry and were able to identify what has happened to it. We were able to say that at the end of the miners' strike 169 pits had been closed and that by the end of March 1988 only 96 were likely to be left, even after three new pits had been opened at the Selby complex. Total manpower has fallen from 220,000 to 127,000—a reduction of 93,000, of whom 78,000 were mineworkers. Those are only figures and do not tell of the misery and pain that that caused mining communities. It went under the name of restructuring, and it was a contraction of manpower and job loss without parallel in recent times in any industry.

As to the market for British coal, there is little doubt that the industry's future is tied up with that of the electricity industry. Over 75 per cent. of British Coal's sales are made to the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board. Since 1982-83, 70 per cent. of its total output has gone to those sources.

It is a matter of record—my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred to this matter in his speech—that the CEGB told the Energy Select Committee in 1986 that it could import 30 million tonnes of coal within three years. Since that time, the Secretary of State seems to have been helping that process. He has given permission for the 8 million tonnes a year deep water port at Fawley near Southampton. The Bill is one of two that seeks approval for two ports on the Humber capable of handling 5 million tonnes a year. The SSEB has facilities to import 1 million tonnes.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): I am pleased that my hon. Friend is saying that foreign coal that comes into the dock, if it is approved, will go directly to the power stations. Is he aware that in the central area coalfields of Nottinghamshire, Yorkshire and the midlands, 65 million tonnes is produced and supplied to local markets, and 50 million tonnes of that goes directly to power stations? Is he further aware that in Nottinghamshire, at Blidworth, 51 per cent. of the coal goes directly to power stations? I can also give the following figures: 80 per cent. at Calverton, 87 per cent. at Ollerton, 93 per cent. at Thoresby, 95 per cent. at Creswell, 97 per cent. at Harworth, 98 per cent. at Bilsthorpe, and 98 per cent. at Silverhill. At Bevercotes, Cotgrave, Sherwood, Welbeck and Clipston, 100 per cent. goes to power stations. Was my hon. Friend aware of that?

Mr Eadie: My hon. Friend has given accurate figures in his intervention. If I have time, I shall identify all the pits that are involved when we discuss importing foreign coal.

The Government seem to encourage those initiatives and act as if they were blind to the consequences for British Coal and its long-standing arrangements with the electricity industry. The free market is the optimum mechanism of planning the production of coal and electricity, despite the fact that Sir Robert Haslam, among others, has warned that the international coal market is not and is unlikely to become a free market.

We must bear in mind that the displacement of 30 million tonnes of coal could mean the closure of about 50 collieries and the loss of nearly 47,000 jobs. On the basis of the CEGB's schedule, the link between certain pits and power stations, and the cost structure of collieries, one can construct an impact table in which collieries are ranked from high cost to low cost.

I should like to confirm what has been said about the effect of the proposed works at Immingham on Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire. We are talking about eight pit closures involving 9,000 jobs. Mining communities can no longer afford such job losses.

In considering the proposals, I want to look at every area in the United Kingdom against the background of 30 million tonnes of coal imports—incidentally, the figure has been increased to 50 million tonnes.

At present there are four pits in Scotland. There will be none left. In the north-east there are seven pits, and one will be left. In north Yorkshire there are now 14 pits and six will be left. In south Yorkshire there are 19 pits and 11 will be left. In Nottinghamshire there are 19 pits and 10 will be left. In the central area—the midlands and north Derbyshire—there are nine pits and four will be left. In the western area there are 11 pits and six will be left. In south Wales there are 14 pits and five will be left. There will be a slaughter.

Mr. Lofthouse: Does my hon. Friend agree that, apart from the 50,000 men in the mining industry to whom he referred, another 30,000 in supporting industries will be made redundant?

Mr. Eadie: I was coming to that point, but I gather that I must leave time for the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, who is sponsoring the Bill, to speak. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] That is fair enough. I shall go on because I have a great deal more to say.

I want to protest on behalf of my hon. Friends in the only way that is possible now. We are not debating the issue adequately. It is a national issue. The average age of the men in the mining industry is 34 and they are being thrown on to the scrap heap. That is a scandal.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): Will the hon. Gentleman watch the clock so that one more speaker from the Conservative Benches may speak? He may find that there is support from these Benches for his arguments.

Mr. Eadie: If I allow time for one more speaker, it has to be for an hon. Member who has been here during the debate. If the hon. Gentleman wants to take part in the debate, he should attend throughout.

I wish to develop some of the important arguments. We must look at the point raised by the hon. Member for Sherwood, my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley and to some extent by my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). What about the cost of this proposal? I have said already that it is stupid to talk about an investment of millions of pounds to liquidate an investment of billions of pounds. We can look at the cost of the kind of proposal in the Bill.

British Coal figures that were prepared for the Manvers colliery independent review body hearing show that the average cost of making a Manvers miner redundant under the existing scheme is £24,700 by way of lump sum payments. If those payments were made to 47,000 more miners, the cost would be £1·16 billion—not millions. The Government have already paid out in excess of £2 billion in redundancy payments to miners. There must be added to those figures the annual cost of unemployment in lost taxes and national insurance contributions, and in unemployment payments. The total cost of redundancies in the coal or related industries is likely to be around £7,000 million. Although I talked about 47,000 miners becoming redundant, there could be 78,000 or 79,000 jobs lost altogether. The sponsor of the Bill has told us about jobs involved in his proposition. Any fair-minded person seeing his proposition, which put thousands of jobs in danger, will realise that it is the economics of bedlam and lunacy.

Mr. Michael Brown rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put, but MR. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I respect your judgment in these matters. I am not seeking in any way to challenge it, but I would draw your attention to your own comments last Friday 6 May, in column 1147 of Hansard.

You kindly undertook that you would have regard to points of order being taken out of time in a debate. I realise that was on an amendment and that we are now talking about a Second Reading. However, when the Chairman of Ways and Means was in the Chair, I sought to move the Second Reading of the Bill at 7.35 pm and for half an hour of my speech there were a number of points of order. I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that you might have borne that fact in mind when considering my request for a motion to put the Question.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. All those factors are borne in mind, but I have also to bear in mind the fact that many hon. Members on both sides of the House still wish to take part in the debate.

Mr. Eadie: I want to begin to conclude my remarks. We have learned tonight that a Department of Energy Minister has stated that the Government intend to privatise the coal industry in the next Parliament. I believe that the Bill is related to that. We will be talking about more and more job losses in mining.

The Government tell us that they are very cost conscious. They are not. This is probably one of the most extravagant Governments in living memory. I could go on to identify——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

European Community (Indirect Tax Harmonisation)

10 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8199/87 on indirect tax rates and structures, 8200/87 on value added tax rates, 8201/87 on the removal of fiscal frontiers, 8202/87 on a value added tax clearing mechanism for intra-Community sales, 8203/87 + COR 1 on convergence of rates of value added tax and excise duties, 8204/87 and 8205/87 on taxes on cigarettes and other manufactured tobacco, 8206/87 on excise duty on mineral oils and 8207/87 + COR 1 on excise duty on alcohol.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the Opposition amendment.

Mr. Lilley: This is a very timely debate. Next weekend the Economic and Financial Affairs Council, hereafter known as ECOFIN, is meeting informally to discuss approximation. It is right that the House should have the opportunity to discuss these matters beforehand, if not to hear them. I know that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will study carefully the views that will be expressed by hon. Members tonight.

I am very grateful both to the Select Committee on European Legislation and to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee for their invaluable reports. Both reports confirm that, in most significant areas, the Government's overall approach is one which most hon. Members support.

Perhaps it would help if I summarised the three main features of the Commission's proposals. First, the Commission has proposed the approximation of value added tax rates. All member states would apply two positive rates—a standard rate between 14 per cent. and 20 per cent.; and a reduced rate between 4 per cent. and 9 per cent. There would therefore be no scope to apply a zero rate. The reduced rate would apply to foodstuffs, excluding alcohol, energy for heating and lighting, water, passenger transport, pharmaceutical products, and to books, newspapers and periodicals. All other taxable items would be standard rated.

The second major feature of the proposals is that exports would no longer be zero rated. Tax would be charged across frontiers, at a rate applicable in the exporting country. A clearing house would reallocate displaced revenues to member states in which goods or services are consumed.

Third, the Commission has proposed a complete harmonisation of rates on excise duties. The proposed rates are based on a mixture of weighted and arithmetic Community averages.

Before commenting on the proposals, I should emphasise that the Government share the Commission's ultimate objective to create a single internal market by removing unnecessary obstacles to trade. We are wholeheartedly committed to that, but, as we have already made clear, we have fundamental difficulties with the Commission's approach.

We simply do not think it is necessary for the completion of the internal market that tax rates be approximated. Moreover, we have a major difficulty with the Commission's proposals for zero rates. As drafted, the proposal makes no provision for zero rates, although the Commission has hinted at temporary derogations for member states with particular difficulties.

We have made specific pledges to the electorate to retain zero rating on food, fuel and power, and children's clothing. I can assure the House that we neither wish nor intend to resile from those pledges. So I would have been happy to accept the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) and our hon. Friends.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): In view of the Minister's spendid assurance about VAT on fuel, if the European Court of Justice tells the Government in about three weeks' time that they are breaking the law by not levying VAT on gas and electricity on industry and commerce—on every small and big firm in this country—will the Government stand firm and reject the European Court's decision?

Mr. Lilley: We are talking about fuel and power for domestic consumption, which is not an issue in the infraction case. If the infraction case were to go against us in the matter of fuel and power for industry, that would not represent a burden for industry. It would be offset against the value added tax levied on output.

Apart from the specific pledges of zero rating on other goods, no specific pledges have been made that would restrict the freedom of action of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We believe that it should remain for my right hon. Friend, who is responsible to this Parliament, to decide whether to retain zero rates on the items on which specific pledges have been made.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Is there any good reason why we should not now have a pledge on books and newspapers, an issue that has caused so much interest and concern? Why cannot we have a simple pledge on that score, which would relax or remove some of the controversy?

Mr. Lilley: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to limit the freedom of action of Chancellors of the Exchequer in that way. In the exceptional circumstances of a general election, specific pledges were made. We do not intend to limit the freedom of action of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in any other way. My right hon. Friend made it clear at the meeting of ECOFIN in November 1987 that the United Kingdom cannot accept proposals that would in any way restrict its ability to retain zero rates of VAT.

We have other areas of difficulty with the Commission's proposals of which the most important are its proposals for excise duty on alcohol and tobacco. The Commission's use of average rates means that in the United Kingdom the duty on alcoholic beverages would fall by between 40 and 85 per cent. while the duty on cigarettes would fall by about 10 per cent. Changes of this magnitude would have a marked effect on Britain's health and social policy. We have made it clear that the United Kingdom has fundamental difficulties with the Commission's approach in this respect.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): As the Minister knows, the difficulties that he has described will return again and again, producing uncertainty in the publishing industry, for example, and in other areas to which he has referred. Can he say that the chief organiser of these difficulties, Lord Cockfield, who is an appointee of the Prime Minister—he is the source of all these ridiculous proposals—will be replaced when his term of office comes to an end? In that way the source of these difficulties will be diminished.

Mr. Lilley: No, I cannot give that assurance. I can say to the hon. Gentleman that Britain is not alone in having problems with these proposals.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): My hon. Friend has spoken of the Government's objection to the changes in excise duty on tobacco and their objection to the magnitude of the change that would be involved. Will he confirm that the Government object also to the sheer crudity of taking an arithmetical average as a means of achieving the harmonisation of excise duty?

Mr. Lilley: I have said that we do not think that it is necessary for achieving the ultimate objective, so I am inclined to accept my hon. Friend's point of view.

As I have said, the United Kingdom is not alone in facing difficulties with the proposals. Almost every member state has problems with the concept of a clearing house for VAT revenues. As proposed, the clearing house would be largely unaccountable, inauditable and open to fraud. The overall tax proposals would cause some countries that rely heavily on indirect taxes to lose a substantial amount of Government revenue, and others would have to increase indirect taxes substantially, or even impose them for the first time, on specific products.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my hon. Friend accept that many of us have a tremendous amount of sympathy for him in his position, he being at heart a sensible person who is living in a world of nonsense? How can it be right that those of us who like to smoke, as I do every now and again, and those who like to drink, as I do every now and again, will find that harmonisation will make drinking and smoking cheaper and make all other sensible things more expensive? Many of us accept that 1992 will be a good year for this country, but how can harmonisation be anything other than a great nonsense?

Mr. Lilley: I admire my hon. Friend's integrity in being able to withstand the prospect of cheapening his vices, and opposing the proposals which would bring that about.

We ought not to forget that the ultimate objective, both of the Commission's proposals and of our own approach to the internal market, is to dismantle unnecessary barriers to trade. The Commission has made clear the fact that it views its proposals simply as a necessary precondition of obtaining agreement on the dismantlement of barriers. Unfortunately, there is now a danger of getting bogged down in disagreements on that intermediate step. Therefore, attention is turning to the idea that we should move directly to starting to dismantle unnecessary barriers.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in the United States, the fact that different states impose individual levels of local tax appears to create no such barriers? Is that not a much better model for the European Community than the line proposed by the Commission?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend makes an important point, and it is one that I intended making. I am grateful to him for making it for me. He is correct in saying that experience in the United States has shown that individual states can retain fiscal powers without damaging the self-evident internal market that the United States as a whole possesses.

Differences in VAT rates in Europe are usually small by comparison with the other factors that may affect prices either side of national borders and bring about a cross-border trading distortion.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Does the Minister accept that VAT on public transport is a relatively small component compared with the subsidy which most other European nations apply to their public transport systems? Will the Minister ensure that our partners in the Community accept that fact, before insisting that we impose VAT on our largely unsubsidised fare levels?

Mr. Lilley: I accept the hon. Member's point, but I do not believe we shall need to deploy that argument because of wider differences and difficulties which we are not alone in facing.

The Commission itself has acknowledged the attractiveness of taking steps towards beginning to dismantle barriers before starting on the process of approximation. We believe there is ground for hope in that respect.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Instead of saying that the Government have difficulties with these matters, why cannot the Minister make a clear and unambiguous statement, with no here or there, that the taxation of the British people is a matter for the House and for no one else? We should be taking these decisions, not a body unelected by the British people and not removable by them.

Mr. Lilley: I gave clear and unequivocal pledges in the matter of zero rates, as the hon. Gentleman will recall. We have already conceded in some respects the power to tax to the European Community. Not long ago, I reported to the House the European Court of Justice case affecting spectacles, which ruling the House will be bound to observe—and the Government accept that it is so bound. I could not go as far as the hon. Gentleman wishes.

The Opposition amendment has been selected for debate and I presume that its intention is to ensure tighter parliamentary control over European fiscal legislation. I have every sympathy with that objective. However, the amendment ignores the excellent work of our European Select Committee in ensuring that Commission proposals are debated before they are finalised. The amendment will also hamper the Government's ability to negotiate forcefully on Britain's behalf, as well as making it harder for member states ever to achieve agreement. It is unworkable and unnecessary. I imagine that that is why the procedure incorporated in the amendment was firmly rejected by the last Labour Government.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is the Minister saying that, important though the Procedure Committee precautions are, he is denying the right of the House to decide what tax shall be placed upon the British people? If he is saying that, he is rolling back 300 years of constitutional history.

Mr. Lilley: I have just been reading the reports of the debate in 1976, in which the hon. Gentleman took part. His Government were then preparing to negotiate the sixth VAT directive. He made a similar point then and failed to persuade his own Government, and I am afraid he will not persuade me. It will be interesting to hear how erstwhile members of that Government and their supporters square the contents of the amendment with the practice of the last Labour Government.

Mr. Spearing: What about the Single European Act?

Mr. Lilley: This is not changed one whit by that.

It is still early days. Last November, ECOFIN referred these proposals from the European Commission to its economic policy committee for economic evaluation. The committee's interim report to ECOFIN in April highlighted many of the problem areas inherent in the Commission's proposals. The committee recommended that, irrespective of what Ministers eventually decided about harmonisation, member states should take steps as soon as possible to reduce obstacles to trade. That is an approach with which the Government can heartily agree.

Ultimately, any change to European tax law requires the unanimous agreement of member states. So the United Kingdom's position is safeguarded and there is no question of our being obliged to accept proposals with which we disagree. I repeat: the pledges that we have given to the electorate on zero rates are firm commitments by which the Government stand.

I have deliberately kept my remarks as brief as possible to enable as many hon. Members as possible to contribute. The purpose of the debate is to allow the Government to sense the feeling of the House. I look forward to hearing the views of hon. Members before ministerial discussion of these proposals gets under way.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I beg to move, at the end of the Question to add:

'and supports the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his recent statement that value added tax harmonisation is a distraction; and resolves that no Minister of the Crown shall give assent to any European Economic Community Instrument that authorises variation in the scope or rate of value added tax or excise duties payable in the United Kingdom unless authorised to do so by a Resolution of this House.'

We accept that frontier controls play a part in the control and administration of value added tax and excise duties for the United Kingdom. The Commission proposes their abolition by 1 December 1992 and says that great benefits will accrue to the Common Market as a result. Lord Cockfield, the Common Market Commissioner who is in charge of creating the single European market, said at Monday's launch of a book on the Cecchini report that the case for integrating the economies of the member states was fully proved. The study is optimistic about the effects of achieving a single European market, and we do not disagree with that, although we reserve our position on the degree of projected economic improvement.

The Commission says that it is essential that VAT and customs and excise duties be harmonised within the Community so that frontier controls can be abolished and a clearing house can be established to redistribute VAT and allocate it to the member states of the Community to which it is due.

I do not believe that these measures are necessary for further economic progress within the Community. Other factors affect company decisions about where to locate and the main conditions that are necessary for fair competition. Differences in costs to industry and variations in tax structures between member states are certainly two such factors. The Commission has conducted a survey of 11,000 business men and the results show that the various VAT rates are not thought to be a serious barrier to intra-Community trade. The survey, which was carried out in 1986 by the Bureau Européen des Unions de Consommateurs, found that prices of pharmaceuticals varied by as much as 500 per cent. between member states. Video recorders were 63 per cent. more expensive in Denmark than in the Netherlands, despite the fact that VAT was only 4 per cent. higher in the former. Prices of spare parts for well-known makes of car vary between countries by up to 52 per cent., before VAT. So I am sure that the rate of VAT and indirect taxes are not important for companies when making their decisions on location, or for competition and pricing policy. It is far more likely that the availability or otherwise of regional development grants, for example, will be seen as more important.

However, there are some problems with the present system. The main justification for VAT harmonisation is the Commission's desire to keep cross-border shopping under control. That happens to some extent in areas such as Luxembourg, the Rhine valley and the border between Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein. I have not heard the Danish Government complaining too bitterly about the cost of the present system, nor have I heard such complaints from the countries surrounding Luxembourg.

The United States manages to live with different taxation in different states despite urban borders such as that between New York state and New Jersey. There are liquor shops in one state but not in another in places throughout America, but that is not seen as intolerable.

The problem, if problem there be, is that a member state of the Community can attract retail customers by levying a lower rate of VAT than its neighbour. If the rate is sufficiently low and the geography is favourable, for example, if there is no Channel, and if the articles or goods are suitable—funerals, for example, are clearly not suitable—retail customers may be attracted across the state border.

That outlines the problem with the Commission's proposals. In order to overcome what may be a problem between some states in some places in the EC, the Commission proposes an all-embracing set of rules. First, it is surely not necessary to set an upper limit to any range of VAT as it is the possibility of member states bidding one another down that causes cross-border shopping problems. Secondly, Commission-identified problems do not occur throughout the Community, but only in some places. The United Kingdom, because of the Channel, is virtually unaffected by different VAT rates in other member states. Again, other factors are more important. Thirdly, some goods, as I have said, such as funerals, are simply not subject to cross-border shopping.

There are other reasons for not accepting the proposals. If implemented, through the extension of the VAT base, they would affect the standard of living of the poorer households. I know that the Government do not care one jot for those. That has been shown by their Budget measures and the cuts in social security and housing benefit——

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Unworthy.

Dr. Marek: It is not unworthy; it is absolutely right. The Government do not care one jot about the standard of living of the poorer households. However, enough of that. There is some cross-party accord on this matter and I shall endeavour to be diplomatic from now on. Nevertheless, the poorest households will be hit hardest if VAT is charged at positive rates on items such as food, energy or public transport.

For example, households on an income of under £60 a week—that includes many households with pensioners and people who are unemployed—spend 43 per cent. of their incomes on goods that are currently zero rated. That is made up of 23 per cent. on zero-rated food and 20 per cent. on other zero-rated items. Contrast that with moderately wealthy families on £450 a week. They spend only 19 per cent. of their incomes on zero-rated goods—10 per cent. on food and 9 per cent. on the others.

Looking at the matter another way, the poorest fifth of all households spent 24·7 per cent. of their disposable incomes in 1985 in direct taxes compared with the top fifth who spent only 18·6 per cent. Many of those poorer households are too poor to pay income tax, but they spend one quarter of their income on other taxes. That is one of the most important statements that I shall make tonight.

The imposition of VAT on books, periodicals and newspapers will damage the quality of those items. It will damage the financial viability of regional and local newspapers. It will be a tax on knowledge. It will be a tax on bibles. It will reduce the number of books available to public libraries and schools. I am sure that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends will wish to make those points much more pungently than I do. The social benefits of reading cannot be disputed. That is particularly true at present when there is considerable anxiety about the problems of illiteracy. It would be an act of madness to restrict access to the printed word, inevitably hurting the poorest and weakest members of our society when education reform deserves a place near the top of any political agenda.

The printed word is not limited to books.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Marek: I shall give way once, but it will be the last time because I want to put the Opposition's case and, like the Economic Secretary, I want to give Back Benchers plenty of time to make their comments in this short debate.

Mr. Porter: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I admire his intellect, but if he would halve his pace and double his volume, we might be able to understand what he is saying.

Dr. Marek: I take that as a helpful comment. Perhaps it should be addressed to those who control the microphones. If they could double the volume, we might get somewhere.

The Government would do well to remember the words of the late Iain Macleod, when VAT was first introduced in the United Kingdom:

"On the general principle of avoiding tax on knowledge we intend that books, journals, newspapers and broadcasting should be at zero rate."

I wonder what has happened to the Conservative party since then.

[Dr. Marek]

The effect on deaf people will be noticeable and adverse. Amplifying aids that allow the hard of hearing to use the telephone and enjoy television would be made to bear VAT as would visual alarms such as flashing doorbells or vibrating pillow alarms. It would be VAT not at the lower rate but at the standard rate—a minimum of 14 per cent. if the Commission's proposals go through unamended. The proposals would also require charity shops to charge VAT on donated goods sold retail.

All that is being proposed with a view to abolishing frontier controls, but frontier controls will almost certainly not be abolished because they will be necessary for public security and to control drug trafficking and immigration. It has not been demonstrated that for the abolition of fiscal frontiers VAT needs to be harmonised. Tax adjustments for goods crossing intra-Community borders do not have to be made on site, with documents on the spot; they can be made elsewhere. There is no reason for upper limits on VAT, and any lower limits ought to be left to the countries affected by cross-border problems to sort out. At the very least, the lower band must be made to start at zero if it is ever introduced. It is right and necessary for some items to be zero rated and our present zero-rated goods and services account for about one quarter of total consumer expenditure in the United Kingdom. There may just be a case for a minimum duty or tax on fuel oil, used by industry, because that feeds into industrial costs, but I can think of no other instance in which a case can be made out.

It is unacceptable to impose a minimum of 14 per cent. on children's clothing in place of the present zero rate. It is unacceptable to put VAT on food. It is a pity that some food carried VAT already, although I realise that there are problems because of the revenue that it brings to the Treasury. It is unacceptable to raise VAT on items such as energy, books, newspapers, medicines and transport. As the Prime Minister said before the last election,

"Look, if anyone tried to put VAT on children's clothes and shoes they would never, never, never get it through the House."

Three times, the Prime Minister said "never". The purpose of our amendment is to make absolutely sure that any such measures come through the House, and I hope that I have the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House on this important matter.

The amendment merely seeks to support the Chancellor in the difficult negotiations that he will have. It is a supportive amendment to enable the House, representing the people of this country, to decide these issues. Equally, the amendment is not intended to antagonise the Commission or other members of the Community, as they value democracy as much as we do.

Let me deal with the harmonisation of excise duties. The Commission's proposals would mean that the tax would go down by about £2·40 on a bottle of spirits and by about 75p on a bottle of wine. There would be a considerable increase in the consumption of alcohol, with appreciable injurious consequences to the health of the nation. We must remember that alcohol-related problems already cost the country about £2 billion a year. The cost of a packet of cigarettes would fall by 12p with a resulting increase in smoking and consequently in illness and deaths from lung cancer.

Those effects would be just as unacceptable to the country as the imposition of proposals to harmonise VAT. In any case, there is likely to be very strong opposition to the proposals on excise duties by various member states such as Spain and Portugal. It must be best to preserve the ability of each member country to set its own excise duties.

An alternative method of controlling and administering the movement of dutiable goods across frontiers is by a system of revenue marking for goods that leave the linked bonded warehouse system that is proposed. Particular markings would give a right for a product to be sold in any particular part of the Community in uniformity, and uniformity in duties would not be required. Cross-border retail shopping would occur in some areas, but, again, for reasons previously stated, I do not consider that to be an important or insurmountable problem.

The Opposition wish to suspend judgment on any such system, and merely ask the Economic Secretary about its costs. How much will it cost to operate? What will its compliance ratio be? Would evasion be possible on a large scale, or by a few criminals? Would there be any variance in those answers if the questions were asked about different states in the Community? If there is an EEC summit meeting, some compromise by the United Kingdom will be inevitable. Will such a system be regarded seriously by other member states, and will it have general approval from the public? If that cannot be demonstrated, I foresee great problems, as harmonisation of excise duties is not an acceptable solution.

I also ask whether there is a further hidden agenda and whether the Commission is putting forward its proposals not only on the specious ground of the necessity of abolishing frontier controls, but because it eventually wishes to harmonise corporation and income taxes. If so, it should tell us and clearly spell out its long-term intentions.

I shall make one final point on the proposed clearing house for VAT reconciliation payments. Companies will have to be careful about their documentation of imports, but as the revenue authorities will be able to recover their money from the clearing house, I imagine that many member states will not be too precise about exactly what was imported. A whole new bureaucracy will be created and our experience with the CAP should make us shudder. What will happen when the inevitable happens and the clearing house cannot balance the books? A rough and ready solution may be found, but we may be sure that this country will lose out. Our collection system is more efficient and more accurate, and as a result, as usual, we will lose out if such a system is established.

Mrs. Boothroyd—I mean Madam Deputy Speaker—I apologise. Yesterday, you were Mrs. Boothroyd and today you are Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I have never been Mrs. Boothroyd in my life.

Dr. Marek: I hope I have shown that the harmonisation of VAT and excise duties is, to use the Chancellor's word, a distraction from the aim of the unified market in 1992. It is unnecessary for achieving the aim of abolishing frontier controls. The problems of distortion of competition by the judicious use of excise duties can be solved in a different way.

The Opposition are resolute in their insistence that zero rating should continue to apply for essentials such as food, children's clothes, fuel, transport, medicines and other important items that are free of VAT at present.

Derogation is not enough as it may not be permanent. By the time that derogation is considered the argument will have been abandoned.

Our amendment supports the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his attempts to persuade the Economic Community of the correctness of those arguments. It also seeks to commit any Minister—a Tory Minister or a subsequent Labour Minister—to consult and receive the assent of the House before any change is made to the rates of VAT or excise duties payable here. In doing so, it is setting out unequivocally the wish of the House that any powers to be given to the Economic Community or any changes in VAT or excise duties will be made as a result of a decisiom of this House. I recommed that the Government accept the amendment and invite all hon. Members to support it in the Lobby if necessary.

[Dr. Marek]

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): My hon. Friend the Minister rightly said that this is a timely debate. It provides the House with an opportunity to express its views in advance of the EEC meetings that are about to take place. The Minister was kind enough to say that the Treasury Select Committee's third report on the "European Commission's Proposals on the Approximation of Indirect Taxation" is invaluable. That is the best compliment that the Committee has received so far on any of its reports.

In responding to that report the Government made it absolutely clear that they agree with the Committee's views. It is important to consider the arguments that we addressed in the report, but the fundamental point is the one that the Government accepted. They said:

"The Government agrees with the Committee that the European Commission has not demonstrated that tax approximation is necessary for the completion of the internal market."

I agree with the Minister about the importance of working towards the completion of the internal market, but I feel bound to say that proposals of the kind that we are debating this evening do not advance the cause of creating a common internal market. On the contrary, they are likely to prove extremely divisive. Therefore, I hope that the House will back the Government by saying that there is no need for these measures and that it is important to preserve the concept of zero rating.

The evidence that the Committee took from Lord Cockfield was valuable and it is attached to the report. It highlights a number of important points. It shows clearly that Lord Cockfield is preoccupied with the need to remove customs barriers, whatever the cost in terms of distorting the Community's tax system. I am not unbiased. Almost 15 years ago I had the task of steering through the original legislation on value added tax. When we were preparing for that series of debates we had the advantage of seeing the mistakes that had been made elsewhere in Europe. We learnt from those mistakes. We devised a system of indirect taxation, value added tax, which in my view is vastly superior to any other system in Europe.

That system had two essential features, the first of which was that we should have zero rating, which meant that essential items, such as food, would not be taxed. When we introduced value added tax we abolished selective employment tax, which had caused great anguish, and also purchase tax. The objectionable feature of purchase tax was that it was a multiple-rate tax that sought to discriminate between one item and another. We said that we intended to abolish purchase tax and that instead there should be zero rating for essential items, with above that a single positive rate so that distortions would not arise.

This is a retrograde proposal. It will mean a return to asking whether one item is a luxury and whether another is not a luxury. If there is to be harmonisation, it is important that it should be introduced on the basis of the best available type of tax. I believe that that is the one that we have. We should fight in Europe for zero rating and for a single positive rate of tax.

Lord Cockfield and the Commission propose, not exactly the lowest common denominator, but what would be the easiest to negotiate by averaging all items. It would result in a hotch-potch which nobody would be happy with and which anybody who gave any thought to the matter would realise was unsatisfactory. The only reason for such a proposal is that it would lead to the removal of customs posts. That seems to me to be the question that preoccupies the Commission, rather than the creation of a sensible taxation system.

There are very real problems, and in his evidence Lord Cockfield made it clear that costs may have to be borne if one is to retain a degree of independence. If that is so, it may be worthwhile paying the price in VAT. As was rightly pointed out a moment ago, we are also concerned with harmonising indirect taxes of other kinds, particularly the revenue duties on tobacco, alcohol and so on. Again, these are taxes which over the years the House has debated for many hours, days and weeks in some cases.

The taxes are imposed for good social as well as revenue reasons. It is wrong to suppose that the arguments can suddenly be overwhelmed in the interests of so-called approximation. It will not be easy to harmonise, because there are many interests in the Community, particularly in countries which produce alcoholic drink, including this country, where the social arguments may be countered by arguments on behalf of the producers. None the less, it would be absurd if we were to reduce the tax on tobacco, for example, by 12p a packet when we consider the costs that tobacco puts on the Health Service. Surely that is one reason why we should not agree with the proposals.

The Government should tell the Commission that we are not prepared to go along with the abolition of zero rating and the other measures that it proposes. The Treasury and Civil Service Committee suggested that we should make that clear at the outset, otherwise in the course of the negotiations it would be one counter to be traded. We should say at the start that any question of abolishing zero rating is not on and then proceed to negotiate on other aspects on which it may be necessary to make concessions.

I shall not speak for much longer, because many other hon. Members wish to speak, but I want to stress that the danger of going along the route of approximation is that we will be stuck with the outcome. There is no existing machinery within the Community for changing it except by reopening the whole package. Therefore, we would be giving up a major fiscal weapon which is necessary to reflect the difference between one country and another until such time as we gradually become a single market. It would be dangerous to say that we will put the whole weight of economic management within the United Kingdom on to direct rather than indirect taxation. I do not have time to develop that aspect, but it should be considered.

I make one final point to the Opposition. I hope that I may have the attention of the shadow Chancellor. The Opposition, together with many other hon. Members, have put down amendments to the motion. It is extremely important that we remain united on the issue. I do not believe that there is any difference in the House on it. We have heard why the Government cannot accept the Opposition amendment. Having expressed their views, the Opposition should not press the amendment to a Division, because that would create the impression that there is disagreement. I believe that the House is united in opposition to the abolition of zero rating and the other proposals, which are not only damaging, but unnecessary.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): In following the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), who chairs the Treasury Select Committee, I can add evidence to the united feeling in the House on harmonisation. I, too, am strongly opposed to it. Indeed, it is an extraordinary achievement of the Commission that it has managed to unite those who are in favour of British membership of the EEC and of the development of the single European market and those who are wholly opposed to both concepts. That seems to have been a slightly perverse thing for Lord Cockfield and others to have set about doing.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Select Committee discussions. There was a curious exchange in the Select Committee. I refer not to the exchanges between the noble Lord Cockfield and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) which had a rather more acerbic quality to them, but to the point where Lord Cockfield said:

"in the Global Communication we said that the Member States should study the proposals and they should respond to them and we are waiting for them to respond".

The Government have taken the view that it would be inappropriate to respond by that means and that they should simply do so by speaking at the ECOFIN meeting. It was curious that there should be a breakdown in communication and that the Commissioner should be under a wholly different apprehension from the Government about how those discussions were to proceed.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Do I hear the hon. Gentleman correctly? Is he now going against the proposals put forward by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), the leader of his party, only a few weeks ago?

Mr. Beith: I am happy to say that I am and that I did so at the time. If Conservative Members had been as successful in dissuading their party leader from pursuing unwise and mistaken tax proposals as we were, they would not now be saddled with the poll tax.

The act of harmonisation was in no way necessary for the achievement of the internal market. The achievement of the internal market is extremely important and valuable to this country. I was genuinely pleased to hear the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) assert that the Labour party believes that the creation of a single internal market is of importance and value. I did not hear loud cheers from behind him, but his assertion is welcome.

As the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the measures are a distraction from the achievement of a single market and an irritant. They are just the sort of measures that get the European Commission a bad name and undermine the effort to achieve wider European unity. They are not necessary because it should be obvious to the Commission that it is possible to have different levels of taxes at the point of sale in a single economic unit without making the coherence of that unit impossible to maintain.

The United States has been quoted as an example of a country with widely varying sales taxes. It is perfectly feasible to have different levels of taxes operating at the point of sale and those differences do not alter the price to the customer of a commodity in the country in which he buys it. If they had a direct bearing on the price of the product in that country, they would represent a distortion of trade, but they do not have that effect and, therefore, they are not a significant impediment to the internal market.

Value added tax has not caused most of the differences in prices of commodities between Britain and other Community countries. VAT did not make cars enormously cheaper, for a period, in Belgium than they were in the United Kingdom. It was primarily the manufacturers' pricing policies which led people to buy cars in Belgium and import them into the United Kingdom and which led the Government into all those complications about whether they should be left-hand or right-hand drive cars. That was the manufacturers' pricing policy responding to the market conditions. We hope that those conditions will change in a single internal market, but VAT was not the cause of those conditions.

An alarming down side would result from harmonisation, which would not allow for a rational decision about the tax level. That is of course true in the case of VAT because of the effect on major budget items, such as children's clothes and food, and on items for which, for other reasons, we think it important to keep zero rating, for example, books and newspapers.

It becomes particularly powerful as an argument when we consider excise duties. The idea that we should now reduce the price of a bottle of spirits by over £2 is absurd, given the enormous problems that are known to exist with alcohol and the fact that a ministerial committee is currently considering ways of tackling the problem and has had lamentably little influence upon the Chancellor so far. Similarly, a 12p reduction in the price of cigarettes would be absurd.

I am prepared to contemplate that, in the future, Europe might, in a concerted way, work out what might be a sensible health policy to guide taxation in some of those areas. However, we are a long way from that at present and we are certainly not in a position where it would be logical to determine the price of those commodities and the tax burdens on them by a process of averaging what is done in this country and what is done in Greece, which is at the opposite end of the scale.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman, who appears merely to be repeating what so many hon. Members have already said. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is advising the House, and me in particular, about how we should vote at the end of this important debate. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Government's stand is not strong enough, or is he merely repeating arguments that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), the Government and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) made? I would appreciate it if the hon. Gentleman could say what he thinks the House should do.

Mr. Beith: I am not saying that the Government's stand is not strong enough, but I would have welcomed a clearer and more unequivocal pledge from them on books and newspapers.

Dr. Marek: They did not make a pledge.

Mr. Beith: That is right. The question that I was asked did not concern books and newspapers; it was whether I think that the Government are taking a firm enough stand on the harmonisation proposals of the European Community. As far as I can see, they are. I have mentioned the apparent failure of communication between Lord Cockfield and the Government. It may be that Lord Cockfield is the one who has got the procedure wrong. No doubt the Minister will clarify that at the end of the debate.

Mr. Lilley: I think that I can offer the hon. Gentleman a better answer to give my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who wanted to know to whom his remarks were addressed. They were addressed to the dual leadership of his party. The motion that the hon. Gentleman would have liked to support, and which I would have been happy to endorse, says that the "objective of establishing the internal market in 1992 in no way requires the approximation of value added tax rates and excise duties".

"Hear, hear", we all say, but the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) and the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) went on record saying:

"Europe cannot get rid of its internal customs barriers so long as VAT rates within the Community range from zero to 38 per cent."

Admittedly that was in a manifesto which, after being declared dead as a parrot, became a personal statement of deeply held views, but has the hon. Gentleman been able to overcome the deeply held views of the leaders of his party?

Mr. Beith: I think that it is on record that I have. When I gave way to the Minister I thought that he would throw some light on the matter for which he is responsible, which is telling Lord Cockfield the Government's view on the matter. As he has failed to do that now, I hope that he will be able to shed some light on it later. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman did not take the opportunity that I gave him. On the other matter, I have already made my position clear.

It comes strange from some hon. Members who have spoken that they profess to want to proceed to the single European market but they are not prepared to provide the conditions essential to its creation. Freedom of capital movements and the ability to concert macroeconomic policy are important, and we cannot proceed to a successful single European market if we are prepared to make no sacrifices of national sovereignty in the process.

We return to the fundamental arguments that we had when we joined the Community in the first place. The Government are suffering from a much longer lasting disagreement than that to which the Economic Secretary referred a moment ago. They are still unable to resolve their internal disagreement about whether Britain will join the European monetary system in time for the establishment of the single European market in 1992. I put the question to the Chancellor when he gave evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. He was unable to add anything. Treasury Ministers have so far failed to overrule the Prime Minister's continuing objections. If the Government could settle the issue by making it clear that they will not engage in the harmonisation that is asked for and then turn their mind to the far more pressing and important question of achieving British membership of the EMS, they would be doing the country, and Europe, a service.

There ought to be no doubt about the fact that there is virtually no support in the House for the harmonisation proposals. If, however, we took a vote on who is prepared to back the true development of a single European market, we might find that the House is more divided.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): VAT is a subject that is close to my heart, especially with regard to children's shoes.

Shortly after becoming a Member of Parliament, I led a deputation to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Anthony Barber, to try to persuade him not to put VAT on children's shoes. I believe firmly that it is essential to do nothing to deter parents from buying well fitting shoes, and price is unquestionably an important factor. We succeeded in persuading him.

I have never been quite certain, but I have a distinct feeling that the fact that a sufficient number of us stood by the Bar of the House while he made his winding-up speech to have defeated the Government if he had not made the concession may have made some slight impression on him. I have always liked to believe that that was so.

Research has shown clearly that ill-fitting shoes can inflict permanent damage on children's feet which may not show until later in life. In the first few years of life, children's feet double in size and continue to grow rapidly up to seven years. They do not stop growing rapidly until the mid-teens. It is vital that shoes are changed as soon as they become even fractionally too small. The Prime Minister has said repeatedly that she will never allow VAT to be imposed on children's shoes. I am sure that she will keep her word. I was glad to hear the Minister's robust support of that promise in his speech tonight.

However, we now have these quite extraordinary proposals, fortunately only intended as a basis for discussion among member states. Two levels of VAT in broad bands are proposed to allow member states some latitude. They also acknowledge the possible need for some derogations from the VAT rules, especially in relation to zero rating. Fair enough. But it is incredible that they do not include children's shoes among the lower band or the social goods band. Children's feet have to last a lifetime. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) has plenty of genes injected into her, but other people have other things.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Hormones.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: It is possible to get a new heart, new lungs, new kidneys and even a new brain—I think that my hon. Friend could do with some of those —but one cannot get new feet. Therefore, it is vital to look after them carefully in infancy and childhood. We should insist that children's shoes are put on a lower social goods band and that the band is changed from the proposed rate of 4 to 9 per cent. to 0 to 6 per cent. That would cost only 160 million ecu across the Community. Surely that is a small price to pay for a lifetime of healthy feet.

I very much hope that those proposals will be made by the Government and accepted by the Economic Community so that we no longer have to rely on derogation but have the zero rate permanently enshrined in European legislation.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am pleased to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman), particularly on the subject of children's shoes. I have here a copy of the debate on 16 May 1972 when, despite her protestations, the hon. Lady, when she could have done, did not move her amendment. My former hon. Friend, now Lord Barnett, moved an amendment to counter the proposal by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), supported by the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), to impose VAT on children's shoes.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: No.

Mr. Spearing: It is no good the hon. Lady saying no, because she knows it is true.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: It is not.

Mr. Spearing: It is.

On 16 May 1972 my hon. Friend, now Lord Barnett, moved the amendment to insert the words:

"Children's footwear of the type and size at present free from purchase tax".

That amendment was voted against, not only by the right hon. Member for Finchley, but by the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit).

A second amendment was to insert the words:

"Garments and footwear of a kind suitable for young children's wear".—[Official Report, 16 May 1972; Vol. 837, c. 246.]

Among those voting no was the hon. Member for Lancaster, so I hope that we shall hear no more from her and from the Prime Minister about their desire not to impose VAT because the Prime Minister, in Cabinet—which was different from the one that she presides over now—and in the House, agreed with the idea of imposing VAT on children's shoes.

I do not say that the Prime Minister is not genuine in her conversion to the belief that VAT should not be imposed, but she sometimes misleads the House when she says that the House will never vote for it. Although it did not do so then, and although the Government had to change their mind, she tried to make the House vote for those very things. That detracts from the vigour and strength with which the Prime Minister upholds the pledge that she gave at the election.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): At that time there was not enough knowledge on what the wrong size shoes would do for children's feet. We had a long briefing on the matter. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) said, she led a deputation on the issue. It was recognised at that time that many adults could wear small size shoes. Therefore, it was difficult to say that small sizes should be zero rated. It was decided that the rate should be determined by the type of shoe rather than by the size of shoe. There was a great deal of discussion on the matter.

Mr. Spearing: No doubt that is true, but the difficulty which the hon. Lady said was dealt with in 1972 will be with us again. I do not think what she has said is relevant. The Economic Secretary to the Treasury, some of my hon. Friends and the Government want the speed of and movement towards harmonisation to be decided by the House. Unless that is decided by the House, it will be decided in negotiations by the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer or a Minister. In those circumstances, the House becomes a consultative assembly. Conservative Members may deny that, but it is the truth. By not passing the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), the House would be saying that we will not have the final word on this issue. We will give the power to negotiate and decide to the Executive. We will give the power to the Executive to decide the tax and we do not reserve to ourselves a veto on the extent and degree of the strength of that Executive. Whether the Executive be in Whitehall or in Brussels, that is the position. Some hon. Members may want that. If they do, they should say so.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham) rose——

Mr. Spearing: I am tempted to give way, but I do not think that I should. We are constrained by time.

We have before us the proposals of the Commission, which the Government have commented on in their explanatory memorandum. The proposals have been summarised in the report of the Select Committee. It is not the Select Committee which decides whether we have a debate, although it can recommend that. It is the House that decides whether we should have a debate before a decision is taken. However, decisions are sometimes taken before we have a debate. The role of the Select Committee is to draw attention to matters, but it cannot decide that we should have a debate. One problem tonight is that we are debating eight proposals in an hour-and-a-half. In former years each one of those proposals would have been a major feature of the domestic British Budget. Is there any Conservative Member who would deny that? Each of the main proposals in the documents before us would have been a major matter for our Exchequer. We are attempting to debate those eight super primary pieces of legislation in the time that is given to a single statutory instrument of secondary legislation.

Mr. Walden: Am I alone in sensing a little disproportion in the hon. Gentleman's remarks? We started with children's shoes, and that has now built up into a major constitutional principle. There is a little gap in between that needs to be filled. To begin with, it is a matter of common sense that most people in this country can afford to buy children's shoes, with or without harmonisation. Harmonisation would bring with it the means to direct extra funds to the small minority of people who need help. To go from there to build a huge and surrealistic issue of constitutional propriety seems to be rather indulgent, romantic and grotesque.

Mr. Spearing: I am sorry that I shall not be able to give way again. The hon. Gentleman has spoilt the debate. He is wrong. I started my speech on that matter because of remarks that had been made and because I happened to have the information with me. This is about our constitution. It is about the power of the House and the power of Conservative Members to decide what taxes should be levied on the people whom they represent. It is about the power of the Executive, and the power of the House to control the Executive. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who I thought was a knowledgeable and intelligent person, does not seem to understand that. He had better read his constitutional history.

The Government have not given the House much information on this matter. It was through parliamentary questions, mainly those of 23 and 24 March, that I had to get my information. I wrote to the Minister on 30 March on a matter relating to those answers but did not receive an answer until today, after four telephone calls and a personal approach. I am not blaming the Minister for that, although he should take some responsibility. The Minister and the House are not being informed about these important matters, hence the ignorant remarks of the hon. Member for Buckingham.

The tables that I have quoted do not give any information about water and sewerage. Unless sewerage services are to be confined to taking sewage from septic tanks, I calculate that on a £1 billion turnover on sewerage there must be about £150 million VAT, and that on £800 million on water at 4 per cent., about £50 million. Can the Minister tell us what the rate of VAT will be on water?

The Minister asked me about my opposition to the sixth directive in 1976. We opposed it because we knew that the derogations were only temporary. I do not believe that hon. Members knew what they were voting for, any more than the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) did over the Single European Act, or the hon. Member for Buckingham if he votes against our motion tonight. If he does so, he will be voting power to the Executive in a way that has not happened in this country for several hundred years.

I believe that the Opposition amendment is not only constitutionally right, but right because it will achieve the objectives that the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) outlined. He said, "We do not like this. We want to go ahead steadily." He is in favour of harmonisation, but in a different way from some of us. That judgment should be for the House of Commons and should not be left to a Minister.

The Minister has said, as has the Prime Minister, "We shall not constrain the Chancellor of the Exchequer." That means that they will not constrain any Minister in Brussels, where they may happen to go for package bargaining and where, at some point, they will have to give way. They have not given any pledge on public transport, on instruments for disabled people, on books, even educational books, on newspapers such as The Sun, or on any other written matter. Surely the House cannot put up with a tax on knowledge. If Conservative Members do not vote for our amendment tonight, they will be saying, "We shall leave that judgment in the hands of the Executive", and not retain it in the hands of the House of Commons, where it should be.

I should dearly love to make other points, but I am not sure that I should, because the time constraints are such, and the matter is of such great importance, that other hon. Members should speak. However, I wish to conclude on one major and important point.

At the moment the power of the House is constrained by the treaty of Rome and by section 2(1) of the European Communities Act 1972. We cannot work outside those self-imposed pieces of written constitution. However, in negotiating this whole question of VAT and excise we can have control of our Executive within those constraints. There is nothing in either the treaty of Rome or section 2 (1) of the European Communities Act 1972 that is inconsistent with the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. That is illustrated by the fact that the Danish Folketing keeps control over its Ministers when they go to Brussels. We are not asking for that total control over all negotiations. We are asking that the House of Commons shall control and be the back-marker in negotiations on VAT and excise. That is much less than the control exercised by the Folketing over its Ministers.

By their votes tonight, hon. Members will determine whether the control of the House over Ministers in Whitehall is less than that of the Folketing over its Government? If hon. Members vote against the amendment, that is what they will determine.

This year, 1988, is constitutionally important for many reasons. As we will learn later, the foundations were laid in 1688 for this House to have control over the Executive, over its power to tax, to borrow money and to legislate. We have an opportunity tonight, within the terms of the treaty of Rome and of the legislation already passed by the House, to retain some of that power. If hon. Members do not vote for that opportunity they will throw away, not their power, because we are the trustees here, but those of the elected people, not just for now, but for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): If the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) had continued for a few more minutes, we might have got back to 1066, such is his perception of the great affairs unfolding before us in Europe. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) that I will not repeat what others have said so far. I am sorry if the unanimity that my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) believes to exist in the House is slightly qualified in my case.

I believe that the House is approaching this matter with extraordinary timidity. There was a defensive and negative aura to most of the speeches. I wonder how this debate will be read in our partner countries. They must think that we have problems that are so unique that they are not experienced on the continent of Europe. That is an extraordinary view.

It is odd that the greatest boldness lies in the neutrality of the Government's motion. The amendments are far more restrictive and narrow in their outlook. We need hardly wonder why the Liberal party is defunct after the way in which the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) spoke. Liberals will be turning in their graves at the narrowness of the hon. Gentleman's attitude because the Liberal party always trumpeted that it was more enthusiastic for Europe than the Conservative party or anyone else. That view was certainly not obvious from the hon. Gentleman's speech, but, after all, the Liberal party is dead.

I want to see the creation of a common market and I believe that it should be an area without frontiers. Real benefits will flow for the countries of the European Community when that is achieved. If we are to compete effectively with Japan and the United States, we must organise ourselves on that basis. While I do not want to get into too detailed an argument about the exact importance of the removal of fiscal barriers, that would make a positive contribution to the creation of a better single market.

My approach is to ask why should it not be done, not why should it be done. Why should we think that the proposal is so appalling that we cannot contemplate it? I concede that the difficulties are obvious enough. I am not saying that we should take the first offer of the Commission straight away, and it is right that we should negotiate from our national position of what we think is right. I am not prepared necessarily to dispute with my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing that we should negotiate to try to secure the best system in the belief that currently we have one of the best systems. We should negotiate with a view to getting something on which we can agree.

I hope that we shall be able to address the matter rather more objectively than did the hon. Member for Newham, South. I hope also that we shall be able to do so without political partisanship. If all political parties that are represented in the House believe that the United Kingdom should be a member of the European Community, it will help the national interest if we have a collective approach to what our taxation policies are to be and whether we are to have effective harmonisation within Europe. If we are to be continually sniped at in Government by an Opposition who say, "If you do this it will be unpopular with the public and we shall vote against it", Britain's national position will not be assisted in trying to achieve the best possible system of approximation, or harmonisation, of taxes within the Community.

I deplore the fact that there are those who suggest that we should run away from this issue and parties that try to take a narrow, partisan advantage at a time when we must face major issues. The reason why we seem to be running away from the issues, if I deduce it correctly from the debate, is that some of us are scared about further concessions of national sovereignty. In the world into which we are moving, national sovereignty is of shrinking importance. I am as proud of Britain as anyone, but the way in which the world is now organised means that we achieve sovereignty only by binding together with other countries. We took that decision by joining the European Community in the first place. We are not giving away anything that is basically essential by wanting to move towards tax harmonisation.

We shall have less opportunity to determine our own taxes, but the opportunity to do so is not being squeezed out altogether. We are being invited to consider a range of taxes, which will still give us some choice. If we are arguing within the context of two bands rather than a single rate of tax, I am prepared to argue that we should try to secure a lower band which starts at zero. Of course that should be our negotiating position. We would have choice within that band to determine what our tax rates should be.

We should bear in mind the advantages that a powerful, unified market will create. Only in the past few days we have received a report from the Commission which attempts to set out the advantages that we can secure by achieving a real single market. We could hope to improve the Community's total gross domestic product by about 4·5 per cent. and increase employment by 1·75 million over the medium term. These are real and solid advantages which we can obtain for our people if we are prepared to be imaginative enough.

Our second difficulty appears to be over the problem of taxing some items that we have not taxed before. I am slightly surprised that in some instances there is fear on the Government Back Benches about this. I understand that it is part of the Government's approach that we should try to transfer the burden from direct to indirect taxation. I am glad that we are not restricting the options of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on VAT.

It would seem that there is a need for education. Anyone who listened to the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, might well believe that there are people in the rest of Europe who are downtrodden and poor as a result of VAT being imposed in their countries on certain items that are zero rated in Britain. Yet we spend much of our time comparing the British economy with the economies of continental Europe and discussing how much further we must still go to improve our standard of living in certain respects.

I do not believe that the Commission's proposals will lead to fundamental difficulties for the British people if we examine them carefully. We hear the argument about levying VAT on books. I read in The Sunday Times recently that the profit margin on books is considerable and that books could be discounted, if only the distributers and retailers were prepared to allow it to happen, by as much as £3 on a £12·95 volume. If that is correct, even VAT of 4 per cent. seems hardly a matter for anxiety.

The same argument is advanced on newspapers. If VAT of 4 per cent. were levied on newspapers, I do not see how that would inhibit readership levels. In the recent past, some of the proprietors have increased the price of many national dailies by as much as 20 per cent. in one fell swoop. We must put those matters into perspective and not run away from some of the possibilities we might have to face in our negotiations. The British public are capable of discussing such matters reasonably.

We must, of course, defend our national interest and negotiate carefully, but let us at least make clear what is in our national interest. I believe that it is to ensure that the European common market can bring for all our people the economic advances that are no longer within the compass of a single national economy.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): The Minister said that he would like to know the strength of feeling among hon. Members in respect of particular subjects. I am concerned about the possible imposition of value added tax on reading matter. That my concern is widely shared is clearly shown by the number of hon. Members who have signed or tabled early-day motions on the subject. My own early-day motion 210 has been signed by 124 hon. Members, and motions tabled by Conservative Members, including that of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), have attracted a similar number of signatories. The expression of concern spreads right across the political spectrum.

The depth of concern is also shown by the number and variety of organisations supporting the contention that value added tax on the printed word is a tax on education. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may argue that there is a case for value added tax in that sector, pointing out that the mere process of producing a book, newspaper or periodical from wood pulp or newsprint adds value to that raw product. He may argue also that ours is the only country which grants exemption for zero rating, and that taxing newspapers, magazines and books is only the same as taxing other forms of entertainment and is therefore acceptable.

[Mr. Robert Litherland]

However, we are all aware of the instability of the newspaper industry. That industry is renowned for its razor-sharp competition. Recently in Manchester, the Mirror Group announced a jobs cutback, with some 136 journalists being made redundant. That represents another shift away from Manchester and the north-west to London-based printing firms. Any additional tax burden could mean the closure of more titles, especially in the provinces.

The effect on employment of the imposition of VAT on reading matter could be catastrophic. The print unions estimate that some 13,000 jobs would be at risk. The industry would be reduced to even fewer ownerships than at present. Publishing houses—especially the smaller firms—would be at risk. Even more at risk would be the most recent enterprises in that field.

It has been pointed out in all the correspondence I have received on this subject that the most damaging effect of all would be on schoolchildren, students, and those who use libraries. In my maiden speech, I made the point that to a child a book should be an adventure. A book meant for a small child should not be considered as a taxable object. What Government would deny a child access to a book? Value added tax on printed matter of that kind would be viewed as a further cut in education resources.

It would also be seen as an attack on adult education. What is the point of encouraging further education if there is to be a tax that will deter people from making progress in education? To impose a value added tax on knowledge flies in the face of public opinion. What Government would deny access for the under-privileged—especially the educationally under-privileged—to these books? The printed word is a means of communication and should be dear to all who believe in the furtherance of the knowledge that is vital to our progress as a human race. It should be above being used to swell the coffers of the Treasury.

We are talking about harmony, and I hope for that tonight when we call on the Government to listen to the people, and the House, and not to Brussels. They should maintain our right to zero rating on the printed word.

11.26 pm

Dr. Marek: First, we should have had a much longer debate—of at least three hours, if not a whole day. The Opposition pressed for that, and it is regrettable that the Government got the feeling of the House wrong and held a debate of only one and a half hours.

Secondly, it is a great pity that the Government have not given a pledge not to impose VAT on books, newspapers and periodicals. No hon. Memer wants such an imposition.

Thirdly, we have heard no good reason from the Government or Conservative Members why anyone should not support the Labour amendment. The arguments for it prevailed, and it would unite the House. It would support the Chancellor in the difficult negotiations that he will have, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You know that this procedure follows that laid down for statutory instruments. Standing Order 14(b) says that if the Speaker is of the view that "the time for debate has not been adequate, he shall, instead of putting the question . . . interrupt the business, and the debate shall stand adjourned".

As this may be the last time that the House can discuss these matters before the Government start negotiations, I ask you to exercise your right under that Standing Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have given careful consideration to the Standing Order and tonight's debate. I must tell the hon. Gentleman and the House that this is a take-note motion. The legislation is in the early stages of gestation; it is what I would call a preliminary canter over the field. There will be ample opportunities for further debate on this, and I shall put the Question at 11.30 pm

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for that ruling. I am grateful, too, to the House for showing support from all sides for the two essential components of the Government's position.

We support the underlying objective of a freer internal market in Europe. To achieve that it is not necessary to move along the proposals for approximation and harmonisation as spelt out by the Commission.

I am sad that the Opposition Front Bench did not take up my challenge to explain why it wants us to accept its amendment, which runs flat contrary to the practice and position of the last Labour Government, let alone all other ones. The amendment goes far further than anyone has proposed in the past. it goes flat contrary to the existing rules, to which the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred and which were laid down by a resolution of the House. It states:

"no Minister of the Crown should give agreement in the Council of Ministers to any proposal for European Legislation which has been recommended by the Select Committee on European Legislation . . . for further consideration by the House before the House have given it that consideration unless—

(a) that Committee has indicated that agreement need not be withheld, or

(b) the Minister concerned decides that for special reasons agreement should not be withheld; and in the latter case the Minister should, at the first opportunity thereafter, explain the reasons for his decision to the House."

Those are tight and binding conditions which have informed and ruled our debates on these matters so far. It would be unfortunate to introduce the rules proposed by the amendment because that would mean that every jot and tittle of European legislation would have to come before the House before it could be formally endorsed in the Council of Ministers by a Minister of this Government. As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) knows in his heart, having been a Minister in the previous Labour Government, that would make it impractical——

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business), That the amendment be made: —

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 8199/87 on indirect tax rates and structures,

8200/87 on value added tax rates, 8201/87 on the removal of fiscal frontiers, 8202/87 on a value added tax clearing mechanism frorintra-Community sales, 8203/87 + COR 1 on convergence of rates of value added tax and excise duties, 8204/87 and 8205/87 on taxes on cigarettes and other manufactured tobacco, 8206/87 on excise duty on mineral oils and 8207/87 + COR 1 on excise duty on alcohol.

Mr. Spearing: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am grateful to you for taking this point of order, as I am for your ruling at the end of the debate. Although, as you indicated, there may be further debates on the legislation, the Government have discharged their responsibility to the House and I am aware of no procedure that guarantees further debates before decisions are made in Brussels. It is true that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Government, or any other hon. Member may raise such a debate, but that cannot be guaranteed.

Secondly, the seven directives that we have discussed tonight may, if followed up, have to come back to the House for legislation for the United Kingdom. If that happens, the terms of the decision in Brussels will have to be complied with by the House, for if a decision by the House was other than the decision by Brussels, the House would be in breach of the treaty.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The very convoluted point of order put by the hon. Gentleman, who I know is an expert on European matters, has been noted.

A249 Road (Sheerness)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ryder.]

11.45 pm

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): The story of the A249 road to Sheerness is a story that should gladden the hearts of our competitors abroad and that should make the British people weep.

In an age when we pride ourselves on the claim that we have got Britain moving, we cannot get a good road built to one of our main deep water ports, to a major industrial growth area, to a large resident population in the prosperous south-east of England. I welcome this chance to tell the House of our problems in securing a first-class road link from the M2 and M20 motorways to the port of Sheerness, the town of Sheerness and the Isle of Sheppey. I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport will be visiting us to see for himself on 20 May. I hope that he will then understand our frustration and that after his visit he will inject into his Department a political determination to plan and to build soon a continuous and good road link to Sheerness.

Let me remind my hon. Friend of what I am sure he knows but that many, apparently, do not. The Isle of Sheppey is a real island. It is linked to the Kent mainland by one bridge—a lifting bridge that was opened in 1960. It is now heavily overloaded and is undergoing major repairs. The bridge has been raised 60,000 times since it was built to allow yachts and commercial shipping to use the river Swale.

Sheppey has a population of 33,000, rising to probably over 80,000 in the summer. It is a major and expanding industrial area, about which I shall say more in a moment. It has an important deep water port, about which I shall also say more in a moment. My hon. Friend will find, as he leaves the motorway, a winding, single carriageway road for several miles, passing through the villages of Bobbing and Iwade. He will see our lifting bridge. He will also see another single carriageway road over the Sheppey marshes linking up with a stretch of new bypass that leads almost, but not quite—we never quite make it to the port—to Sheerness and to the docks.

The road is narrow and winding, passing is almost impossible. Traffic is usually heavy. Certainly at peak hours, with repairs and perhaps the bridge lifted, delays and tailbacks can be great and the frustration even greater. However, I can almost guarantee that, when my hon. Friend the Minister comes, there will be no jams, no delays and no bridge up and that he will sail through without delay. That is life. However, the position is generally as I have described it.

It is not my purpose to talk about our problems with road repairs, but it would be wrong not to put on record the frustration of the Sheppey community and others about the coincidence, despite all the assurances we received beforehand, of major repair works on the bridge, on the A249, on the M2 and on the M20 simultaneously. It makes those of us who live in Kent feel as though we are totally beleaguered.

I acknowledge readily that there are some road plans in the pipeline, but I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that when nothing comes out of the end of the pipeline people grow somewhat cynical and frustrated. Let me take, for example, the Iwade bypass. I have a letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport dated 3 November 1982. It reads:

"We hope to be in a position to consult the public on the route during the summer of 1983. The normal statutory processes will then follow, which would allow the work to start in 1986."

We have not even got into a planning inquiry yet and the prospects of that starting seem to diminish all the time. Can my hon. Friend tell me what has gone wrong?

Let me remind my hon. Friend of some offerings from his Department regarding improving the road north of the bridge. On 28 July 1986, two years ago, he told me that that was a candidate for inclusion in the road programme. In regard to the same stretch of road, on 23 April 1987 he said that the Department was bearing the question in mind in the current review. Five days later, on 28 April, he told me that it had not been possible to add a scheme. He then held out the hope that there might be some additional consideration later in the year, but that came to nothing. These are modest extracts from the massive file.

We have had meetings with Ministers, petitions to Downing street, endless correspondence and so on. The Sheppey Industries Association, VOICE, the employers' organisation for Swale, and the borough council have all been tireless in pressing the case, let it be said, not just for a local road for local interests which any hon. Member would always espouse, but for a national route of fundamental importance to the road network, to industrial output and also to the ordinary motorist and to the residents of the locality.

It is not my purpose to speak at length about the Kingsferry bridge because it is too big a subject to deal with in a short Adjournment debate. The Government know that Swale borough council recently commissioned Mott, Hay & Anderson, eminent consulting engineers, to undertake a feasibility study into a new Swale crossing. We should congratulate the council on its initiative and the engineers on their report.

The estimated cost of a single carriageway bridge would be £18 million. The cheapest tunnel would be £24 million. This is a nettle which the Government will have to grasp before long. The consultants said that a second crossing would probably be justified in about 10 years' time. If we start planning now, it will be 10 years plus before we get a second crossing. At the very least we should be taking serious initial steps to put the new crossing into the programme. In the meantime, there are various traffic management suggestions which could improve traffic flows. These should be considered urgently by the Department.

May I draw the attention of my hon. Friend to the traffic figures which show that there is complete justification for dualling the road north of the bridge? At the bridge itself last October the count was 20,200 vehicles a day. This flows on to the narrow single carriageway for which, I understand, the design flow now would be little more than 10,000 vehicles a day. We should compare that with, say, the A20 at Harrietsham where there are 28,000 vehicles a day. Admittedly that is more, but it is getting a three-lane motorway bypass. The A226 at Gravesend, with only 15,000 vehicles a day, is getting its bypass now. At Thanet way, where again the figures are less than for Sheppey way, miraculously dualling has leapt into the programme and work has been started. Perhaps that is because it is a county programme. Somehow the county seems to be able to get on with the job more quickly than the Department does when trunk roads are involved. It is also noteworthy that the number of heavy goods vehicles on Sheppey way is 13 per cent., which is considerably higher than the national average. There again the growth forecast for traffic is also higher than the national average.

With regard to growth, even in recent months there have been announcements of new industrial investment at Ridham dock and on the island. With all the industrial land that is available for development and the strategically important location of Sheppey, it is obvious that traffic growth will continue apace. Sheppey is already an important industrial area. For example, we have Sheerness Steel, one of our national success stories. It is a major steel industry which produces 5 per cent. of the total national steel production. Despite the company's commitment to rail traffic, rail sidings and its wagon fleet, it still uses 240 vehicles in its works. It is a great success story for the United Kingdom, but it faces tremendous road problems. There are glass, electrical, pharmaceutical and other steel industries and a range of other significant employers. There is major Canadian, Japanese, German and American investment. Sheppey is truly an international island.

However, the greatest success story is that of the port of Sheerness which, from the darkest days following the closure of the naval dockyard, has transformed itself into one of the most thrusting and competitive ports in the United Kingdom. It is the largest fruit port and the largest car terminal for imported vehicles in the United Kingdom. It is one of the largest and the fastest expanding port in forest products, such as paper, pulp and timber.

The ferry business there has grown dramatically and continues to expand at a rapid rate. Last year, the Olau Line, with its three superb ferries, carried 570,000 passengers, 104,000 passenger cars, 4,000 coaches, 60,000 freight units and 35,000 trade cars, but that capacity will be enormously increased when the two new ferries are delivered soon. The port generates almost 2,000 jobs. Sheerness is now, excluding oil and bulk carriers, the fifth largest port in the United Kingdom, yet it does not have a decent link road from the motorway.

The strategic importance of Sheerness is even greater than I have indicated. It is the only deep-sea port in Kent, and indeed in the south-east, as far as Southampton, that can service the international shipping trade in respect of the Channel tunnel. With 40 ft of deep water at low tide, Sheerness has some of the deepest water in the United Kingdom and is, apart from the wretched road link, the ideal deep-water port to service the Channel.

If we are to attract major shipping lines to the United Kingdom and then tranship, via rail or road, through to Europe, Sheerness is the ideal location. If it happens the other way round, Britain will lose that trade and the jobs and economic spin-off from it. It is evident that a first-class road system linking Sheerness to the motorways is an integral part of any sensible strategy for the south-east, so why have we been left behind? Why have we not had the same priority as other places? More important, will the Minister use his authority to ensure that we now receive priority?

Let me spell out briefly what is being sought and what could be achieved by the Minister putting his weight behind the scheme. First, the general objective is to establish that there needs to be a dual carriageway from the M20 to Sheerness, certainly as far as the new Queenborough bypass on the island. Secondly, the proposed dualling of the section from the M2 to the A2 is in the programme. May we have construction urgently and without any slippage?

Thirdly, the Iwade bypass from Key street on the A2 to Sheppey bridge is in the programme. I welcome the proposed dual carriageway and readily accept that it will be a superb road of immense benefit, but we are becoming alarmed at possible slippage. It has not yet even gone to public inquiry. Will the Minister stress to his officials that it is a priority route and that no delay can be tolerated?

Fourthly, north of the bridge, from the bridge to the Queenborough bypass, we need a dual carriageway, either as a road improvement via Cowstead corner or, preferably, a new fairly short stretch of dual carriageway as a direct link from the bridge to the Queenborough bypass. That is not a major road scheme in terms of distance, cost, land acquisition or engineering. When my hon. Friend sees that miserably inadequate stretch of road, stuck between the proposed end of the new dual carriageway to the south and the new Queenborough bypass to the north, he will understand our frustration. If he agrees, will he please put it into an early construction schedule and not into a distant programme for the 21st century?

Fifth is the scheme for the entrance to the Sheerness docks. I believe that it is ready to go. May we please get construction started? Sixthly, I return to the really difficult problem—the Kingsferry bridge. I do not think that there is an immediate, satisfactory solution, but the Government should authorise investigation into the best long-term solution—it has to be a tunnel or a second bridge—while backing interim management schemes to improve traffic flows over the bridge.

Of one thing I am absolutely sure: with dual carriageways either side of the bridge, there will be major improvements in traffic flow. We must not hold up the dualling of the road on the ground that the bridge is a bottleneck. That is a recipe for eternal inaction.

Most of what I am asking for is already committed. Most of it is already in the programme. Therefore, what we need is not money but speed, no slippage, no further delays, a sense of purpose and action. The other improvements that we seek, especially those north of the bridge, are not costly in road spending terms. All it needs is a simple political commitment to the concept of a first-class road to Sheerness soon, and a ministerial boot up backsides if there is any avoidable delay.

If we really are trying to build a modern Britain, will my hon. Friend the Minister please do his bit to ensure that we have a modern road to this vital part of the United Kingdom?

12.1 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) for raising the important matter of the A249 to Sheerness. He has for many years pressed successive Ministers through correspondence, meetings and visits to the area. He has also had a good deal of success. His aim is to improve the A249, which is the only access from the mainland to the Isle of Sheppey and its expanding port of Sheerness. His ardent campaign for improvements has been ably supported by the Sheppey Industries Association, VOICE—Voice of Industrial Company Employers in Swale is, I think, the plain English—and local authorities. I pay tribute to his energy and to his concern for his constituency.

By a mixture of oratory and rough language my hon. Friend has perhaps given me a foretaste of what I shall experience when I visit the area. I am sorry that I was not able to go on the previously appointed day, and when I do go I do not intend to make any earth-shattering announcement. We shall, however, reconsider the need for improvements to the A249 between Kingsferry bridge and the Queenborough bypass in the next review of the trunk road programme. To assist us in our consideration, a scheme identification study on the relevant section of the A249 is to be carried out by Kent county council. We shall arrange for the study to cover the possibility of providing extra capacity at the bridge, although it is too early, as my hon. Friend said, to say whether that can be justified or, to put it more moderately, when it can be justified.

The trunk road programme remains one of the Government's priorities. We are determined to do as much as possible to continue to develop the trunk road network for present and future traffic needs. The major schemes on the A249 that are already programmed are good examples of schemes that meet our policy of improving roads to ports and getting traffic out of villages. Further improvements to the A249 will be considered in the next review. I look forward to my planned visit to the A249 on 20 May, when I shall meet my hon. Friend and the Sheppey business community.

My hon. Friend referred to the port of Sheerness. The Government fully accept its importance to the local area and to the nation, and the need to improve access to it. If I have time, I shall say more about that. Sheerness, which is owned and operated by the Medway Port Authority, is, as my hon. Friend said, the fifth largest continental car ferry port after Dover, Portsmouth, Harwich and Ramsgate. It handles more than 1·5 million tonnes of cargo each year. Half of that is accounted for by 50,000 freight vehicles on the Olau Line service to Flushing. There are also 700,000 passengers and 100,000 cars. The port also handles car import operations and other deep-sea trade. Confidence in the future success of the port is shown by the opening by the Medway Port Authority of a £9 million car terminal in February 1987. The Olau Line has also announced the building of two new jumbo ferries, an investment of £100 million. They will enter service on the Sheerness-Flushing route in 1989 and 1990. To meet that demand, MPA plans to start new berth construction later this year.

My hon. Friend talked at length about the A249. It is clearly the vital link both to the port and to the industrial and commercial interests of Sheppey. It is a lifeline to those who live and work there. The A249 extends for about 20 miles north-eastwards from Maidstone to Sheerness, and has major junctions with the M20, M2 and A2. Before 1979, the A249 was the responsibility of Kent county council. Because of the industrial development on Sheppey and expansion of the port of Sheerness, it was decided to transfer responsibility for the section between the M2 and Sheerness dock to the Secretary of State for Transport. A short section northwards from the M2 to Chestnut street was trunked in July 1979, and the remainder—about 10 miles—to the docks in October 1983. South of the M2, the A249 is the responsibility of Kent county council.

Between the M2 and Sheerness the road is a single carriageway of varying standards of alignment and visibility. The route undoubtedly has a very poor accident record. In the three years from 1984 to 1986 there have been 145 injury accidents—seven involving fatalities, 44 serious injuries and 94 slight injury. For every injury accident, there are many damage-only ones.

The present traffic on the M2 to Kingsferry bridge section is in the range of 13,000 to 16,500 vehicles a day, taking a 16-hour day. As my hon. Friend said, to overcome those problems we have two major schemes under preparation comprehensively to improve the A249 to dual two-lane carriageway standards from the M2 to Kingsferry bridge. The latter is a combined road and rail crossing, and the only crossing to the Isle of Sheppey.

I realise that, welcome though those schemes are to my hon. Friend and his supporters, they do not satisfy their demands to replace the Kingsferry bridge and to upgrade the road northwards to Sheerness docks. I hope to deal first with the programmed schemes and come to the suggestions for further improvements.

The Iwade bypass was added to the programme in February 1982. What started off as a scheme for a small local bypass of the village of Iwade has been extended to cover the four miles between the A2 at Key street and Kingsferry bridge. The scheme will provide substantial relief to the village of Iwade and the neighbouring communities of Bobbing and Howt Green, as well as greatly improving the road link to Sheerness docks. Public consultation was held in December 1985 and a preferred route, which runs to the east of the present A249, was announced in December 1986.

Last autumn we had hoped that by now we should be able to publish the necessary statutory orders for our preferred scheme under the Highways Act. For reasons over which we had no direct control, the programme for the Iwade bypass has slipped. Kent county council has recently brought forward, in its transport policies programme, proposals for a Sittingbourne link to connect directly with our scheme. That means that a new interchange will be needed. We accept that it is sensible to take account of the Sittingbourne link in our planning for the Iwade bypass scheme, but it will require us to take a fresh look at the traffic and economics for the combined proposals. In particular, it could have a consequential effect on our present proposals for the A249-A2 junction at Key street. All that will inevitably delay the publication of the draft orders for the Iwade scheme. We now hope that the draft orders for Iwade will be published early next year and that the proposals for the scheme and those for the Sittingbourne link will be dealt with at inquiries at about the same time, possibly later in 1989. Experience suggests that it is unlikely that an inquiry can be avoided.

I realise that any delay is disappointing. My hon. Friend talked about assurances. It is my policy to try to avoid giving assurances. I spend most of my time picking up ones given by Hore-Belisha and various Ministers at the Department of Transport between him and me. My hon. Friend also asked whether I would grasp the nettle. I have a special pair of gloves because there are so many nettles in road planning that it would become painful otherwise.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

Our experience shows that a scheme should be taken forward only after careful preparation. We want to get the design right and to avoid unnecessary delays later. The scheme, to improve the A249 to dual carriageway standards between its junctions with the A2 at Key street and the M2 at Stockbury, was added to the programme in the 1985 review. Public consultation on two route options was held in February 1987. We expect to announce the preferred route decision this summer. We hope thereafter to be able to proceed fairly quickly with the scheme, but timing will depend on the necessary statutory procedures.

We recognise the importance of the A249, but it was not possible within the resources available and against competing pressures of other schemes to add a scheme to the programme at last year's review, either for a second crossing of the Swale or an improvement north of the Kingsferry bridge. We have said many times that the cost of a second crossing would be considerable and hard to justify. That is still the case.

The Department's view on a replacement bridge received some support from the results of a study commissioned by Swale district council, which concluded that although the present bridge and its operation did cause delays, any major improvement would be difficult to justify economically. However, I hope that the announcement that we are asking Kent county council to see what can be done will be of some comfort.

As my hon. Friend knows, the Kingsferry bridge is jointly owned by British Rail and the Department. British Rail operates it and is responsible for maintenance. In June 1985 the Department was informed of possible chloride problems. Testing by BR confirmed the presence of chloride contamination in the deck of the bridge. Extensive remedial works were started in early December last year. Early in the contract it became clear that contamination was much worse than feared and required a greater degree of remedial work.

Because of the importance of communication with Sheppey, we considered carefully with BR the requirements to be imposed on the contractor to keep delays to a minimum. We have been able, by night-time working, to keep two lanes of traffic open between 6 am and 8 pm. Traffic flow through the works has inevitably been slowed. There have been delays.

BR says that the remedial work is nearing completion and is expected to be finished by the end of June. My hon. Friend will wish to know that the necessary rewaterproofing and resurfacing works cannot be carried out without extending the existing night-time single lane operations to include some daytime lane closures. A press notice will be issued. We intend to allow single lane operation from 8 pm to noon on both Fridays and Saturdays. Every effort will be made to reduce this and to keep traffic disruption to a minimum.

Problems with planning and executing the Kingsferry bridge repairs have resulted in a backlog of essential work and postponed schemes. While the Department is anxious to avoid more than one set of roadworks at a time on the A249, works cannot be postponed indefinitely. It is planned to avoid roadworks on the A249 during the summer school holiday period.

I say to my hon. Friend that if every hon. Member pushed as hard as he did, my job would be more difficult than it is. When I visit on 20 May, I expect to come with my ears and my eyes, rather than with my mouth. I look forward to seeing for myself and hearing from my hon. Friend and those associated with him in working to give the best road communication with the Isle of Sheppey.

When I heard that my hon. Friend had secured this important debate, I hoped that it was to celebrate what I call our joint campaign to build the Rochester way relief road. One of the first things that I remember when I came to the House was my hon. Friend asking for that road to be completed. I apologise for the fact that we managed to open that road before solving the problems of the A249 to Sheerness.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Council of Ministers

1. Mr. Knox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next proposes to have discussions with the European Community Council of Ministers about European monetary matters.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): At an informal meeting of European Community Finance Ministers in Germany on 14 and 15 May.

Mr. Knox: In his discussions with his European counterparts, will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is Government policy to continue to try to achieve the maximum possible exchange rate stability?

Mr. Brooke: I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will continue to say the same sort of things to his colleagues on the continent as he has before.

Mr. Beith: Will the time ever be right for Britain to join the European monetary system as long as this Government are in power?

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Gentleman knows, that matter is kept under continual review. The Government will join when they think the time is right.

Mr. John Browne: In his discussions, will my right hon. Friend agree to put a proposal to his fellow Ministers that, with the advent of the single European market, with the free movement of labour, goods, services and capital, we shall have the economic conditions that will allow us to have a single European currency instead of the composite currency that now exists in the form of the ecu? Will he remind his fellow Ministers that in the United States the dollar encompasses 52 states, each with a different tax regime, so there is no need to wait for European tax harmonisation? Will he also remind them that each year about £2 billion is made by foreign exchange dealers dealing in European currencies alone?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend advances a visionary idea, but I doubt whether my right hon. Friend will say that to his colleagues this weekend.

Mr. John Smith: In relation to European and other exchange rates, what is the Chancellor's exchange rate policy? We were told that the pound would be aligned with the deutschmark when it was below Dm3, since when the level of the pound has consistently risen, despite the Chancellor constantly telling us that each rise is unsustainable. As the Chancellor told The Wall Street Journal yesterday that the pound should continue to be aligned to the deutschmark, at what level should it be so aligned? Or has he been elbowed aside by the Prime Minister, and is it now his policy that it is unsustainable?

Mr. Brooke: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me a long question. There is a long answer to it in my right hon. Friend's evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee.

Tax Breaks

2. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax breaks are eliminated or reduced by the Finance (No. 2) Bill 1988.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): The main tax breaks eliminated or reduced by this year's Finance Bill are the forestry tax shelter, the tax relief for non-charitable convenants and for home improvement loans, and the under-taxation of company car scales.

Mr. Arnold: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the elimination of these loopholes, which were inherited from the Labour Government, is extremely welcome and constitutes the reverse side of the coin of the tax cuts in the recent Budget? They are particularly welcome as they will reduce the load on tax lawyers and tax accountants, who can then put their brilliant minds to work that is productive to the economy. In taking these steps further, will my right hon. Friend learn from experience in the United States in this regard?

Mr. Lamont: It is not often appreciated that in many respects we have gone further than the United States, which retains some—and more—of the reliefs that we have. If one adds to the list business entertainment, life assurance premium relief and the alterations that we have made to align capital gains tax and income tax, the revenues raised by these changes in 1989-90 will be more than £800 million. We do not hear much about that from the Opposition.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: When the Prime Minister was wagging her finger at the Chancellor, as was reported to him by his hon. Friends, was it because of differences about the exchange rate, because of a difference of opinion over interest rates, or just because she was telling him to let the pound rise, no matter what the expense to British industry?

Mr. Lamont: Those are highly interesting questions, but, alas, they have nothing to do with the question on the Order Paper. All that I shall say to the hon. Gentleman is that I was there and he was not.

Mr. Boswell: Does my right Friend agree that one of the best consequences of lower tax rates is a reduction in the premium on the avoidance of tax? In that contest, will he promise to consider a speedy end to the close company provisions, which now seem wholly redundant?

Mr. Lamont: I shall consider my hon. Friend's latter point; and, of course, his first point is entirely right. The dramatic reductions in rates that we have made substantially reduce the incentive for people to waste a lot of time trying to find a way round and through the tax system—something that they did enormously when we had punitive taxation rates under the previous Labour Government.

Mr. Gordon Brown: But will the Financial Secretary confirm that for every tax loophole that was closed in the Budget another was opened by the Chancellor? Will he also confirm that whereas somebody earning less than £60 a week will be paying 25p in the pound in tax, which is completely unavoidable, the man earning £1 million, by using all the tax loopholes that the Chancellor has made available to him, can end up with a tax liability of absolutely nil? How does he defend that?

Mr. Lamont: The first point that I would make is that if the hon. Gentleman thinks that under the Labour Government there were not ways in which someone's tax bill could be reduced to nil, he does not know what was happening. Secondly, we have deliberately retained some reliefs in the tax system, such as the business expansion scheme and the enterprise zones, because we think that they serve a socially useful purpose. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman is so opposed to enterprise zones. The other day he said that some rich men are now finding the charms of Middlesbrough irresistible. That shows that the tax relief on enterprise zones is doing some good. It has doubled employment in the enterprise zones.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for brief questions today and then we shall have brief answers.

Inheritance Tax

4. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the financial effect on the Exchequer in a full year of the changes in inheritance tax announced in the Budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The full year cost is £220 million measured from an indexed base.

Mr. Bennett: Does the Minister accept that that is a substantial sum and that for an estate worth £1 million the tax bill has now been cut by £148,000? How can the Government justify giving money away in that way? Surely incentive is not an appropriate justification. Would it not have been better to help those of my constituents who have lost housing benefit and rent rebates? That would be a much more appropriate way for the Government to spend money than to give it to those who are already well off.

Mr. Lamont: If the hon. Gentleman had been here earlier this week he would know that we debated that matter fully. Several of my hon. Friends made the point that the incentive to hand on money is one of the most important incentives for keeping businesses together, and we believe that that contributes greatly to the incentives that are necessary for the growth of our economy.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the difference between Conservative and Opposition Members is that Conservatives believe that income tax and inheritance tax relate to money that belongs to the individual, whereas the Opposition believe that it belongs to the state and that we should be given back only a little pocket money?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is entirely right. He might also have added that if we had punitive rates of inheritance tax we would probably find that we raised less money, because since we started cutting the rates of inheritance the yield has gone up.

Dr. Marek: What conceivable reason is there for the Chancellor to give away money on estates worth £1 million and more to the super-rich, who do not need it? It cannot be because there will be any incentive. It cannot be because it will attract other people to Britain. The Minister has admitted that it is a loss to the revenue. Is it not a theft of public money from the Treasury to give to people who have far too much already?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman entirely ignores the fact that the money is the taxpayer's in the first place. What conceivable reason is there to want to break up existing family businesses?

Mr. Carrington: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most welcome aspects of the changes in inheritance tax is that the effective rate, taking into account the business property relief on the transfer of small businesses to the next generation, is now below 20 per cent.? Is this not a great encouragement for the formation of small companies, as well as for the prosperity of coming generations?

Mr. Lamont: The Government have very much altered the nature of inheritance tax, not only with the change to which my hon. Friend refers, but with the provisions for lifetime giving. It seems to escape the notice of Opposition Members that the burden of inheritance tax at the lower end was such that, because of increasing house prices, it was hitting many people of comparatively modest means.

Government Departments (Advertising)

5. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he takes to ensure that advertising expenditure by Government Departments is kept under control.

16. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how Her Majesty's Treasury monitors the public expenditure of Government Departments on advertising.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Major): The cost of advertising is found from departmental spending programmes, as published in the public expenditure White Paper. The Treasury does not monitor and control it separately.

Mr. Banks: Is the Chief Secretary aware that Government expenditure on advertising has gone up fivefold since 1979, and, in the current year, is estimated to be £88 million? I realise, of course, that rotten products take a lot of advertising to sell, and nothing comes more rotten than Government policies. However, as many of the policies on which the taxpayers' money is spent are controversial, does the Chief Secretary agree that, rather than the taxpayer funding party political advertising by the Conservative party, Conservative Central Office should make a substantial contribution?

Mr. Major: The underlying premise of the hon. Gentleman's question is entirely wrong. In fact, the percentage of Central Office of Information expenditure on advertising is not materially different in the current year from that of 1978-79. On advertising generally, it is in everyone's interest to know about policies and new schemes and to receive advice on such matters as health and safety, and that is precisely what the Government are determined to do. They stick strictly by proprietorial rules that have existed for many years.

Mr. McCrindle: Would it not save the necessity for Government expenditure on advertising if my right hon. Friend were to take this opportunity to tell us what Conservative Members particularly wish to know, namely, that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has no intention of resigning—or is that a hypothetical question?

Mr. Major: I can certainly express a strong preference for my right hon. Friend remaining Chancellor for a considerable period. The evidence of his time as Chancellor is that he has produced a remarkably successful British economy.

Mr. Rees: The Chief Secretary referred to costs. Whose job is it in the COI to decide whether advertising has crossed the boundary into being party political?

Mr. Major: The role of the COI is to advise the Government on matters of propriety in relation to advertising. The COI is, of course, responsible to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. The final decision on advertising is a matter for the departmental Minister, but the Government are bound to accept the rules presented to the Widdicombe committee, and do so.

Mr. Curry: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the money being spent by the Department of Trade and Industry on advertising to encourage companies to take advantage of the single market is money well spent, but that if companies are to observe this exhortation they must be endowed with a stable and sustainable rate of exchange against the deutschmark?

Mr. Major: I believe that advertising designed to advise people of the merits and desirability of the single market is money well spent. It represents an extraordinary opportunity for British industry, and we wish to see it taken.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The House was interested to hear the Chief Secretary confirm that responsibility for the COI within the Government Treasury team has slid from the Paymaster General to the Economic Secretary. Will he confirm that the reason that that change was slipped through, without a great blaze of publicity, was the clear conflict of interest between the Paymaster General's duties to the Government's Treasury team and his duties as chairman of the Conservative party?

Mr. Major: There can be no conflict of interest in that respect. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor passed the responsibilities for the COI to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to ensure that there was no such conflict, and he did that before there was a single representation from the Opposition to the effect that that change was needed.

Overseas Assets

6. Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the stock of United Kingdom net overseas assets.

Mr. Brooke: At the end of last year the United Kingdom's net overseas assets were estimated at some £90 billion, second only to those of Japan.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that encouraging answer. Will he confirm that a substantial part of those assets is in the United States? Does he believe that that is one of the main reasons for the most encouraging report in Fortune magazine on the excellent performance of the United Kingdom's economy under the stewardship of the Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Brooke: I do not know whether there is a connection between the two facts that my hon. Friend mentions, but he is correct in saying that there has been a warm endorsement of my right hon. Friend's policies by Fortune magazine.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Does the Paymaster General agree that the value of the assets depends on sterling's exchange rate. Will he say how the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been able to have a quarrel with the Prime Minister on that most important matter, over which he has supreme authority? To quarrel with the Prime Minister on such matters may be unwise, but to do so openly is foolish.

Mr. Brooke: I confirm that the exchange rate affects the scale of overseas assets.

The right hon. Gentleman's second question does not seem to follow from the question originally asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth).

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the excellent figures of overseas assets prove the strength of the British economy? Does he further agree that the money that has been invested abroad has been extremely good, not only for our invisibles, but for our export potential? Does he also agree that we should do nothing to prevent the mobility of capital, no matter where that capital is invested?

Mr. Brooke: I endorse my hon. Friend's views. The removal of exchange control has played a substantial part in the build up of the assets that we have secured.

Mr. Holland: Surely the Government realise that the scale of foreign direct investment by British companies is disproportionate to Japanese investment. Japanese investment is mainly in the financial sector and buying other countries' companies. Our foreign investment substitutes for export trade. The evidence to prove that suggests that the scale of United Kingdom direct investment is undercutting exports to other countries and that is one of the reasons why we do not have an effective response even when the pound is low, and despite the fact that at the moment the Chancellor cannot get it low.

Mr. Brooke: In practical terms the answer to that question is the opposite to the hon. Gentleman's proposition. He has omitted to notice that the Japanese have placed their largest investment within the European Community in this country. A substantial part of that investment is in manufacturing.

Mr. Batiste: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the benefits accruing to Britain from those overseas assets will continue long after the transient benefits of North sea oil? That is a major vindication for the abolition of exchange control.

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend is correct. In 1987 the net income from overseas assets was the highest ever recorded.

Balance of Payments

7. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what impact he expects the taxation changes announced in his Budget to have on the balance of payments.

12. Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the impact of the taxation changes in the Budget on the current account of the balance of payments.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): None.

Mr. Henderson: What action will the Chancellor take to prevent the rich from further damaging our balance of payments by spending their tax cuts on European cars, Japanese electronics and perhaps even Swiss chocolates?

Mr. Lawson: If I may say so, that is an extremely foolish question, even from the hon. Gentleman. I do not know whether we shall be told, in one of the new policy documents on public enterprise culture that are coming from the Labour party every day, what people may or may not spend money on, but the plain fact is that what distinguishes the rich is that they save a higher proportion of their income.

Mr. Darling: Despite the Chancellor's answer, is it not inevitable that increased consumer spending as a result of the tax cuts is bound to suck in more income? Will he consider what changes he can make to company taxation to encourage spending on research and development so that British manufacturing industry can improve its position, which in some cases is quite woeful?

Mr. Lawson: We all know that the Labour party is against tax cuts, that the Labour party voted against the basic rate tax cuts in the Budget, and that the Labour party, if it ever had the mischance to gain office again, would put taxes up, but that is not the road to economic success, as we saw when the Labour party was in office. The tax reductions in the Budget are part of a supply side programme which will improve the performance of the economy, and, over time, strengthen not only our economy as a whole, but the balance of payments in particular.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does my right hon. Friend recall that in the past United Kingdom Governments have deliberately devalued the currency in an attempt to increase export competitiveness and have usually failed to do so? Will he compare that with the performance of the strongest economies, such as Germany, Switzerland and Japan, which have the strongest currencies and also the strongest export performance?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. It is very difficult to know what is the current policy of the Opposition. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) does have an exchange rate policy—that, whatever the exchange rate, it ought to be 20 per cent. lower. He has made that clear on a number of occasions. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) will tell us whether he agrees with that.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the exceptionally strong overseas asset position that we now enjoy, coupled with the healthy state of public finances, means that we can regard with equanimity the prospect even of a balance of payments deficit? Is it not clear that since the Budget the foreign exchange markets have taken the same view?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. The temporary current account balance of payments deficit after six or seven years of continuous surplus is not a matter that should cause alarm. Certainly it is striking how overseas opinion has confidence in the British economy, despite the temporary current account deficit. That is shown by the popularity of sterling at the present time. It is also shown by the Fortune (9 May, 1988) article to which my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) referred, which said:

"Britain is Back . . . the 20th century's archetype of unstoppable industrial decline has suddenly stopped declining and come roaring back."

Mr. Cryer: Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer talk about the booming economy and explain what the Government are going to do to remedy the current balance of payments deficit of about £4·5 billion? What are they going to do about the balance of trade deficit in manufactured goods with the Common Market, which is in excess of £10 billion? Does he regard those massive balance of trade and payments deficits as a mark of economic success, or of economic disaster, along with the 2 million jobs that the Government have disposed of in the manufacturing industry—more than Adolf Hitler achieved between 1939 and 1945?

Mr. Lawson: Manufacturing industry is doing very well indeed and is doing better all the time. That has been recorded in CBI survey after CBI survey. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's crude mercantilism is a help in understanding these economic matters. The plain fact is that if monetary policy is sound, inflation is low, fiscal policy is sound—indeed, we have a balanced Budget and we have a surplus—and British industry is getting steadily more efficient, there is very little wrong with the British economy.

Mr. Watts: Does my right hon. Friend agree that his Budget tax changes will help to sustain our extremely satisfactory rate of economic growth and the improvement in the performance of our economy, upon which our trading performance ultimately depends?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. Our growth throughout the 1980s has been consistently at the top of the major European league table, and I expect that it will again be at the top of that league this year. As for the future, that is the whole point of the supply side policies that we have been pursuing in successive Budgets—to create a climate in which British industry and the British people can give of their best. That is why the British economy is doing so much better than it has ever done at any time since the war.

Mr. John Smith: As the Chancellor raised the question of exchange rate policy during earlier exchanges, can he tell us straight what his policy is on the exchange rate? He told us when the pound was less than Dm3 that the pound should follow the deutschmark. Since then it has gone up, through various so-called unsustainable levels, until it now stands at Dm3·16 and may go higher. Do the Government want the pound to be worth more, or less?

Mr. Lawson: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman can answer that question. I put it to him earlier. I have explained the policy very clearly to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. That explanation is now available and it is well known to most hon. Members on both sides of the House. We also know the policy of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), which is that whatever the exchange rate is, it should be at least 20 per cent. lower. That is not my policy. What is the Opposition's policy, and what is the right hon. and learned Gentleman's policy?

Pensions (Income Tax)

8. Mr. Waller: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the weekly value to the average pensioner couple of the changes in income tax for 1988-89.

Mr. Major: The Budget changes in income tax will be worth over £4·10 a week to the average pensioner couple paying income tax.

Mr. Waller: While recognising that about half of all pensioner couples do not pay income tax at all, and that this year's Budget will have taken about 195,000 pensioners out of income tax altogether, may I ask whether my right hon. Friend agrees that it is very good news for all those pensioners who pay tax that they will have gained, on average, about £4·19 a week from this Budget?

Mr. Major: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, except in one tiny respect. It is not one half of pensioners who do not pay tax. As a result of the increase in age allowance and other changes, two thirds of pensioners do not now pay income tax.

Mr. Winnick: How can the Minister justify that claim? Although pensioners will receive a tax reduction, in many cases they will be paying £15 to £20 a week more in rent and rates, compensation for which will be only on a transitional basis? How do the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary justify a position in which the richest 1 per cent. of taxpayers are receiving 70 per cent. of all the Budget tax concessions?

Mr. Major: Between 1979 and now pensioners' real incomes have risen, in real terms, five times more than they increased in real terms between 1974 and 1979. Most pensioners' incomes under the social security changes have been either increased or are unchanged. The transitional protection arrangements that were announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services deal with the problems that are faced by a minority of pensioners who, until then, were losers.

Mr. Jack: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in addition to the benefits from the tax changes as they affect pensioners, the control of inflation is also important, as it affects their disposable income? Pensioners remember how they were affected during the period when those who sit on the Labour Benches were in government. Does my right hon. Friend also agree that the increase in their disposable income will give pensioners a great opportunity to take the products of national savings, many of which are tax-free?

Mr. Major: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The change that has taken place in recent years in the living standards of pensioners was most effectively shown in the family expenditure survey that was published some time ago. Many people were considerably surprised by the improvement that has taken place.

Mr. Chris Smith: Is the Chief Secretary able to tell us what the weekly impact is on a pensioner couple, especially those with a small occupational pension, of the changes in the housing benefit tapers and the 20 per cent. rates payment provisions that were introduced by the Government in April? Do they not wipe out in hundreds of thousands of cases any small benefit that was available under the Budget?

Mr. John Smith: Yes.

Mr. Major: No, the answer is not necessarily yes. The net effect on a pensioner couple as a result of the changes will depend on a variety of intangibles, but in the vast majority of cases considerable protection is provided against them, and the average living standards of pensioners have materially increased.

Economic Growth

10. Mr. Cran: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the regional growth rates in the British economy in 1986-87; and what information he has on regional growth rates in other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries.

Mr. Lawson: The latest official estimates of United Kingdom regional money GDP growth, measured at factor cost, are for 1986. I shall arrange for the relevant information to be placed in the Official Report. Estimates for regional GDP, but on a somewhat different basis, are available for other EC countries in the Eurostat Yearbook of Regional Statistics, a copy of which may be obtained through the House Library.

Mr. Cran: Is my right hon. Friend aware that unemployment in my constituency of Beverley in east Yorkshire has fallen by the staggering total of 22 per cent. in the past year? Is it not an incontrovertible truth, and a fact that should be understood by the Labour Benches, that the Government's economic policy works in the north of England as well as in the south?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. One of the most encouraging signs of the current strength of the economy is the way in which prosperity is spreading throughout the economy and unemployment is coming down throughout the economy. Only the other day I was looking at the figures for job vacancy advertisements in some of the leading regional papers. It was interesting to note that in the Manchester Evening News job vacancy advertisements are up 26 per cent. from a year ago; in the Bradford Telegraph and Argus they are up 40 per cent. and in the Birmingham Evening Mail they are up 41 per cent. My hon. Friend will be particularly interested to know that job advertisements in the Yorkshire Post are up 61 per cent.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Chancellor not worried by the expansion of domestic credit—[Interruption.]—as manifested by the inflation of house and property prices in the south-east? If he is to take corrective action on interest rates, which he was hinting to the Wall Street Journal, will he also take action to protect those parts of the regional economy that are not suffering from these problems?

Mr. Lawson: As I pointed out, one of the most encouraging aspects of the current economic scene is the way in which prosperity is now spread throughout the country, and in which unemployment in particular has gone down faster in many regions than in the south-east of England. Of course there is a regional imbalance; there always has been. When the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) was a member of the Labour party—I do not know his party now—and indeed a junior Minister, there was a regional imbalance. But all parts of the economy are growing faster now than they were then.

Mr. Oppenheim: Bearing in mind the effects on growth of exchange rates, can my right hon. Friend tell us the cost of supporting the dollar last year and the loss in sterling terms? Does he think that it was money well spent?

Mr. Lawson: We do not publish figures of the exchange equalisation account and its operations, for obvious reasons. No previous Government have done so. If the House wants to investigate this matter, a perfectly proper channel for that is an investigation by the Public Accounts Committee, as indeed occurred in 1978. At that time the practice of the Government, which was the same as this Government's, was endorsed. As for intervention in the foreign exchange markets, it is a very foolish Government who refrain from intervention in foreign exchange markets in all circumstances.

Mr. Skinner: When the Chancellor of the Exchequer has looked through all those newspapers at the situations vacant columns, and perhaps found himself a job, will he tell the Prime Minister first? When he has done with it, will he get all the bundles of papers together and pass them to the leader of the SDP, because he is looking for a job, and then pass them on to the Liberal Chief Whip, because he is looking for a job, and then to the present leader of the Liberal party/SDP, because he is looking as well?

Mr. Lawson: I do not think it would be right of me to intrude into this delicate subject of rather private grief.

Following is the information:

11. Mr. Baldry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the United Kingdom annual inflation-adjusted rate of growth since 1981; and what equivalent information he has about the United Kingdom's major competitors.

Mr. Major: Between 1981 and 1987, total output in the United Kingdom grew on average by over 3 per cent. a year. That is faster than in any of the other seven major industrial countries except Japan.

Mr. Baldry: Is it not particularly gratifying that, in 1987, growth in United Kingdom manufacturing output was dramatically higher than in any other country in the Group of Seven? Will my right hon. Friend consider going halves with me in buying every Opposition Member a copy of the recent issue of "Fortune" magazine, so that they may have a better comprehension of the dramatic and continuing improvement of the United Kingdom economy?

Mr. Major: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's first point. On his second point, I am not entirely sure that it would be money well spent, but I am prepared to try it. For my hon. Friend's interest, and that of the Opposition, I affirm that, since 1980, in manufacturing alone, output per British worker has risen by more than 5 per cent. a year. That is even faster than at any time in the 1960s.

Inflation

13. Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement on progress towards the elimination of inflation.

Mr. Major: The elimination of inflation remains our ultimate objective.

Mr. Beith: As the Government—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Interruptions take up a lot of time.

Mr. Beith: Talking of ultimate objectives, as the Government are acknowledged to be three years behind on their target of eliminating inflation, will the Chief Secretary tell us to what extent that is because of price increases that the Government have imposed on nationalised industries, and to what extent it is because of the Chancellor's judgment that the measures that are necessary to squeeze inflation out of the system will stop growth?

Mr. Major: For reasons that are unknown to me, the hon. Gentleman's popularity seems to have grown rather substantially in the past few days.

The slower progress is not really surprising, given the strong growth performance of the economy. The hon. Gentleman touched upon that proposition in his question.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Although exchange rates clearly have an important role to play in bringing down inflation, does my right hon. Friend accept that the competitive edge of British industry could be undermined if sterling continues to rise? My right hon. Friend has referred to the tremendous contributions that manufacturing has made to the British economy in recent times, but such contributions could be completely undermined. Is it not important that we keep a careful watch if we wish British manufacturing to continue to play a major role in our economy?

Mr. Major: As my hon. Friend knows, it is certainly the Government's intention to ensure that manufacturing continues to grow as it has done. On that basis, we are certainly keen to aim at price stability. We agree, too, that the stability objective in the exchange rate is also a highly desirable proposition.

Balance of Payments

14. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the balance of payments deficit for 1988-89.

Mr. Lawson: The financial statement and budget report forecasts a current account deficit of £4 billion in 1988.

Mr. Wareing: Does that answer not reveal to us that one of the real reasons for the deficit has been the fact that the Government have converted a manufacturing trade surplus into a chronic deficit? Will the Chancellor take the opportunity now to explain how high exchange rates will help our exporters to be competitive, and how, as he said in his interview in the Wall Street Journal, high interest rates, not only in this country but in others, will increase economic activity, encourage investors and, indeed, boost employment?

Mr. Lawson: I am surprised that this figure really reveals anything, because it was published two months ago. As for the substantial point that the hon. Gentleman made, the comparison between this Government and the Labour Government is quite the reverse. During the whole period that this Government have been in office there has been cumulatively a substantial current account surplus, whereas during the Labour Government's period there was a current account deficit. Even more important is the real sign of competitiveness of manufacturing—yes, of manufacturing. During the period of the Labour Government Britain's share of world trade in manufactured goods was steadily declining. During the period that we have been in office it has stopped declining for the first time in decades, and has in fact risen slightly.

Husband and Wife Taxation

17. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect upon elderly taxpayers of the change to independent taxation of husband and wife.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Over 80 per cent. of the 1·1 million elderly married couples paying tax under the present system will have less tax to pay under independent taxation, and 160,000 elderly couples will be taken out of tax altogether.

Mr. Knapman: I am obliged to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Can he confirm that elderly wives will get age allowance in their own right for the first time?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is right. That is one of the aspects of independent taxation that makes it very valuable to elderly people.

Manufacturing Output

19. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the growth of manufacturing output in 1987.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Manufacturing output grew by 5¼ per cent. between 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Devlin: Given the fact that there has been a 90 per cent. increase in GDP per head in the northern region, does my right hon. Friend see a significant improvement in manufacturing industry in that region?

Mr. Lamont: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said earlier, this last year has been an extremely strong one for manufacturing output, and he expects that the same will be true for this year as well. That obviously bodes well for the northern region.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Hughes: In the course of her busy schedule, will the Prime Minister pause to consider the desperately long hospital waiting lists in Gwent, which, combined with the recent Scrooge-like cuts in social security benefits, would seem to illustrate her complete lack of concern for the plight of ordinary people? May I point out to her—or perhaps she needs an astrologer, after all—that it was factors of this sort that led to the virtual extermination of the Conservative party in Newport in the local elections last week?

The Prime Minister: With regard to the Health Service, first, there have been two specific programmes directly related to cutting down waiting lists that have been very successful. Secondly, there have not been cuts in the Health Service. Indeed, nearly £2 billion more is allocated to the Health Service this year than last. Thirdly, there have also been increases in social security. Again, another £2 billion has been allocated to social security over and above previous years. None of this could have been done unless my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had run the economy in such a way as to ensure a higher standard of living and of social services.

Sir Marcus Fox: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to consider the implications of the gains made by the Conservative party last week on the Bradford metropolitan district council, plus the defection this week of a Labour councillor who has joined us, thus making us the largest group on the council? Is this not a sign that people in the inner cities are looking to us to ensure for them a better future by controlling Government locally and nationally?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I join my hon. Friend in congratulating the people of Bradford on their wisdom. The results give Bradford new hope and a new chance. Prosperity is spreading widely all over the country, including the Bradford area.

Q2. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ross: Does the Prime Minister recall that a few days ago she told the House that she would seek reassurances from the Government of the Irish Republic that they would not back out of their responsibilities under the Anglo-Irish Agreement with regard to terrorism? Does she recall, further, that she told the House that the people of Northern Ireland would have their rights maintained under the Anglo-Irish Agreement and that the Government of the Irish Republic had accepted that? Did her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State bring back such assurances after his private meeting with Mr. Haughey last week?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Member has quoted correctly what I said. The Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed by both Governments and registered with the United Nations, and must continue to be upheld. That, I believe, is now understood on both sides of the border.

Mr. Heseltine: Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the fact that it is 40 years to this very day since a Labour Minister announced that Britain would have its own independent atomic deterrent? Will she further reflect upon the remarkable contrast between what now must be seen as the giants of the postwar Labour Government and the political and parliamentary pygmies who have replaced them?

The Prime Minister: Yes. In those days there was virtually no difference between the two sides of the House on the importance of defence and the nuclear deterrent. What a pity there is such a difference now.

Mr. Blunkett: In view of the Government's unwillingness to use the Industry Act 1975 or other powers to intervene to protect Rowntree from the proposed takeover by Nestlé, will the right hon. Lady confirm that she is not willing to intervene to protect any industry, service or national asset from international predators and that it is the Opposition, not the Conservative Government, who would protect workers and the people of Britain?

The Prime Minister: I confirm what my right hon. and learned Friend pointed out on Tuesday, that when we receive a bid it has to be dealt with in accordance with the law passed by the House, after debate. That law is that the opinion of the Office of Fair Trading must be obtained and that the Secretary of State must wait to receive that opinion before making up his mind on whether such a bid should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. After that has been received, he will decide. If he decides to refer it, the matter can be dealt with under competition rules or under public interest. I hope that the hon. Member is not suggesting that we can disobey the law of the land.

Rev. William McCrea: Will the Prime Minister take it from me that the vast majority of the people throughout the United Kingdom deplore the unwarranted attacks on the members of the SAS who carried out an effective action in Gibraltar in defence of the innocent? Does the Prime Minister agree that it is disgusting that some people inside and outside the House are more concerned about terrorists than about the welfare of our security forces?

The Prime Minister: I join the hon. Gentleman in saying how thankful we are for the excellent services of all members of the security forces in protecting us from terrorism.

Q3. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: Following the disclosure yesterday in the National Security Archive in Washington of Colonel Oliver North's memoranda, can the Prime Minister give the House a categorical assurance that her Government have never, either directly or indirectly, perhaps through the CIA or her friend Colonel Pinochet in Chile, facilitated the supply of arms to the Contra terrorists in Nicaragua?

The Prime Minister: I have given the answer so many times. I will repeat it again. I can say categorically that we have not agreed to supply Blowpipe, and we have not supplied Blowpipe, to the Contras.

Mr. Forth: Has my right hon. Friend yet sent congratulations to the President of France on his re-election? Has she noticed that the leaders of the Governments in two of the great democracies in the world, France and the United States, will reach the end of their elected terms of office in their late seventies? Is she determined not to be outdone in this matter?

The Prime Minister: I have sent a message of congratulations to the President of France, and I have spoken to him. We hope to arrange a meeting, probably before the Toronto summit, to discuss important matters. I have also noted the point to which my hon. Friend referred. I assure him that at all times I shall take a balanced view of these matters.

Mr. Kinnock: The pound has risen again against the deutschmark. Is the Prime Minister content to see it going on rising?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will complain when the pound goes up and when the pound goes down. The Chancellor will run the economy in such a way that he will combine low inflation with good economic growth. He has been extremely successful in that objective. It is an objective and an achievement which completely eluded the Opposition.

Mr. Kinnock: It is a pity that the Prime Minister could not answer that question. Can she answer this one? Does the right hon. Lady recall the Chancellor of the Exchequer saying two weeks ago, when the pound was lower than it is now,

"I do not want to see the exchange rate appreciate further. It would be unsustainable and . . . damages business and industry."

Does the right hon. Lady agree with the point that the Chancellor made?

The Prime Minister: I agree that the Chancellor runs the economy extremely well, with low inflation—which Opposition Members were never able to do—and with excellent growth, giving all people in this country a much higher standard of living.

Mr. Kinnock: That is all very interesting. Can the right hon. Lady give us a straight answer? Does the Prime Minister agree with her Chancellor of the Exchequer?

The Prime Minister: We shall continue to run the economy, with low inflation, and excellent growth, which gives a high standard of living and a high standard of social services. It is that total picture that counts. What a pity that the right hon. Gentleman cannot understand the answers or the economics.

Mr. Holt: May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the position today in Langbaurgh and Redcar, where the Labour party is in total disarray?

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister is not responsible for that.

Mr. Holt: Will my right hon. Friend today send a message of support to the new Conservative mayor of the borough of Langbaurgh and Redcar, where the Labour administration has fallen apart and two Labour Members are now voting with the Conservatives?

The Prime Minister: I will join my hon. Friend in doing just that, and join him in congratulating the mayor.

Mr. Bernard Ingham

Q4. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister on approximately how many occasions since January 1986 Mr. Bernard Ingham has given briefings to the press on the unauthorised disclosure of letters between Ministers; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is not the practice to comment on Lobby briefings.

Mr. Dalyell: Why is it that in the course of many, many speeches, many, many broadcasts and many, many press statements, not once has the truthfulness of the Prime Minister and of Mr. Ingham about the events of January 1986 been endorsed either by the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) or the giant from Henley (Mr. Heseltine)?

The Prime Minister: The details have been given many, many times in the House. I have nothing further to add to them.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend note today that the——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has not looked at the Order Paper. This is a definitive question.

Q5. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Is the reason why no replacement was made when Lord Whitelaw resigned as Deputy Prime Minister that the right hon. Lady already has a Deputy Prime Minister, her chief press secretary, Mr. Ingham? Although the right hon. Lady clearly has many difficulties in getting on with her Foreign Secretary and Chancellor of the Exchequer, is it desirable that a chief press secretary should have more influence in policy matters than any of her Cabinet colleagues?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Member must be hard put to it for a question to ask that one. I note that he cannot find a single thing to criticise about the economy or about the way in which the country is run. How very revealing.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: If my right hon. Friend today, as First Lord of the Treasury, receives a request that the Bank of England Export Credits Guarantee Department should underwrite any deposits required by aspirants for the job of leader of the Social and Liberal Democrats, will she please resist it as firmly as she can?

The Prime Minister: I take note of my hon. Friend's sentiments.

Q6. Mr. A. J. Beith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Beith: How long will it be before the pensioners who are now paying increased rents but hope to benefit from the Government's about-turn on the social security changes know for certain that they will benefit, and how long will it be before they receive the money?

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman, who I hope has an interesting week ahead, will already have received a letter from the Department of Health and Social Security giving details of a freepost and freephone service, where any inquiries can be made. He will know that a special unit has been set up in Glasgow to deal with each of those matters, and he will also know the place to which people can apply if they have any queries.

Mr. Squire: Following my right hon. Friend's visit to Docklands this week, will she underline from the Dispatch Box the outstanding achievements in terms of jobs, housing and transport systems that the combination of private and public funding has achieved?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I went to Docklands yesterday. The result of the work of the London Docklands Development Corporation is quite outstanding. It is outstanding in the amount of investment that has been made there. About £4 billion of private sector investments have been secured. It is outstanding in the number of jobs that the area is providing. There are now 36,000 jobs in Docklands and the number unemployed has fallen by 15 per cent. It is outstanding in community support. About £17 million has been spent on that. It is outstanding in increased road and rail improvements. It is outstanding in housing in the private sector, and one notes that a quarter of purchasers of new homes on LDDC sites were former local council tenants. It is an outstanding achievement in every way for private enterprise, the imagination of the Government and the way in which the whole scheme has been administered by the first two chairmen and their deputies.

Mr. Dobson: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement and for providing Government time for a debate on the arts. We hope that it is not a case of "Debate now while stocks last".

When may we expect a statement from the Secretary of State for Social Services on the U-turn unit set up to sort out the confusion that has occurred since the Government agreed not to cut housing benefit by as much as they originally intended? Hon. Members on both sides of the House still do not know the answers to the many questions that they are being asked by constituents who have been affected and they need an opportunity to obtain some answers from the Secretary of State.

Secondly, when can we expect the wide-ranging debate on foreign affairs that the Leader of the House promised some months ago?

Thirdly, may we expect an early Government statement on the reasonable and entirely justified desire of ex-Japanese prisoners of war to obtain compensation for their suffering?

Fourthly, in view of the outbreak of salmonella poisoning in the House of Lords, will the right hon. Gentleman, in the interests of all of us, even including those in the Press Gallery, bring forward a Bill to lift Crown immunity from the Palace of Westminster or give a fair wind to the Bill sponsored by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) to do so?

Mr. Wakeham: First, the hon. Gentleman referred to the debate on the arts and I am grateful to him for his appreciation of the fact that we have found time for a debate on that important subject.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman referred to the social security arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend. I believe that the statement and the letter sent by my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled adequately set out the way to proceed, and, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, those who want further information should follow the procedures. Nevertheless, I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend to see whether anything else needs to be done.

I know that there is considerable interest in having a debate on foreign affairs, and, although I cannot see the possibility of a debate in the immediate future, I shall certainly be looking for an opportunity before long.

I recognise that recent court judgments are of concern to ex-Japanese prisoners of war. Clearly those responsible will have to study the matter before we can make an announcement on it.

With regard to the unfortunate events in the House of Lords, I am not sure that bringing more legislation before the House will do much good for those who may be in difficulties at present. Most hon. Members will know about the strain of salmonella poisoning from which some people in the House of Lords are suffering. I shall ensure that the House is kept informed of any developments.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): In regard to the conduct of business, is my right hon. Friend aware of the anger and frustration, both in the House and the country, at the way in which the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, having secured its Second Reading by a substantial majority, having gone through its Committee stage successfully and having completed its Report stage save for the vital final votes, was talked out? As the Government will not give time for the completion of this private Member's Bill, seeking to amend a major Act, which is on the statute book only because a previous Government gave it additional time, does it not follow that they are morally bound to take up the issue themselves and to promote legislation to end the scandal of late abortions? When may we expect a statement from my right hon. Friend?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the very strong concerns expressed by my right hon. Friend and by many others in the House and the country. As I said to the House on Friday, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), who is in charge of the Bill, has nominated tomorrow as the day for further discussion, so there may be an opportunity for the House to decide these matters if that is what it wishes to do. The Government's position is already clear. It is not our practice to provide extra time for the consideration of individual private Members' Bills, and I do not want to anticipate tomorrow's proceedings. My right hon. Friend knows that if his assessment of them is correct, I am ready to discuss the matter with him.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Without anticipating tomorrow's proceedings, may I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1086, signed by 107 hon. Members and urging that compensatory time be provided?

[That this House noting the great public interest in the Abortion (Amendment) Bill and the concern that this House should reach a decision on this important matter, calls upon the Government to find the means by which time can be provided to compensate for that which was lost on Friday 6th May in order to enable such a decision to be reached.]

The Bill achieved a majority of 45 on Second Reading; we completed the debate on Report and were in the midst of the votes on Report. The early-day motion seeks to resolve that constitutionally awkward position. Will the Leader of the House at least consider other ways in which the Government can provide for hon. Members to arrive at a proper decision on the question?

Mr. Wakeham: I hear and understand what the hon. Gentleman says but do not want to anticipate what happens tomorrow. The Government believe that it is a very grave step for them to intervene in the process of private Members' Bills. I repeat that it is not the Government's practice to provide extra time.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I add my pleas to the two that have already been made to my right hon. Friend. I have to say in fairness that, on Friday, the debate had finished and the arguments had all been put but, because of the tactics used by the Bill's opponents, the votes were not allowed to be taken. As the debates have been completed and the arguments put, I do not understand why the Bill's opponents are not prepared to allow the House to make a democratic decision. Although I understand the Government's difficulties in allowing extra time for private Members' Bills, surely we can at least have time to take the votes after hearing the arguments.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise what my hon. Friend says and I wish that I could be more forthcoming. As my hon. Friend knows perfectly well, this is a controversial matter. The Government's position is clear, and I do not think that I can add to what has been said.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I thank the Leader of the House for passing on to the Home Office my constantly raised question about reform of the Boundary Commission procedures. Now that the Home Office has turned down the report by the Select Committee on Home Affairs, would it not be a good idea to have a debate? When the Boundary Commission starts work, many hon. Members will find that the same mistakes will be made next time as were made last time.

Mr. Wakeham: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his comments. I recognise his experience in these matters and take what he says very seriously. I do not know whether there is a general desire for a debate, but I shall consider the matter and ascertain what can be done, if necessary.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): I am aware of my right hon. Friend's attitude to the Government giving time for debates on private Members' Bills, but will he say whether or when time can be provided for the Abortion (Amendment) (No. 2) Bill, now under consideration in another place? The Bill, after long consideration, recommends the 24-weeks limit, which it appears may command a majority of support in this House. I make this plea in the belief that there is a degree of frustration, both in the House and in the country, about the inconclusive attitude adopted towards the Abortion (Amendment) Bill in this House. I suggest that this would be a constructive way forward.

Mr. Wakeham: I say in all friendliness to my hon. Friend that I have enough difficulty in sorting out the Bills that are presently before the House without anticipating what I shall do about the Bills that have not yet arrived.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Has the Leader of the House seen my early-day motion 543 on New Zealand and the EEC?

[That this House affirms the right of British consumers to continue to buy butter from New Zealand in the same quantities as now; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to ensure that there will be no diminution in New Zealand's butter exports to the United Kingdom.]

It now has more than 200 signatures of hon. Members on both sides of the House. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that a motion with support on that scale should be debated soon by the House, especially since it is on a matter of so much importance to New Zealand and the British consumer?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the force of what the right hon. Gentleman says. The Community will have to take into account a range of factors, including budgetary costs, consumers' views, its stance on trade policy issues in general and the pressures on the dairy industry resulting from quotas. It would be premature to discuss the Government's approach before the Commission has made proposals.

I am sure that the whole House would wish to express to the very distinguished New Zealand high commissioner and his family our sympathy following the dreadful physical attack made upon them and to wish them a full and speedy recovery.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): My right hon. Friend will recall that yesterday the private Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown)—the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill—failed to make progress because of the rather deplorable disruptive tactics in which the shadow Leader of the House, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), took part. My right hon. Friend will recall also that the shadow Leader of the House suggested that there was an urgent need to reform the private Bill procedure. Has the hon. Gentleman made any submission or given evidence to the Select Committee that is considering this matter?

Mr. Wakeham: I have many responsibilities in the House, but I am not responsible for what the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has to say. I am sure that any hon. Member who believes that the private Bill procedure is antiquated or in need of reform will take the advice of the Chairman of Ways and Means, who is responsible for these matters, and give evidence to the Select Committee, which is ably chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson), and thus put forward their points of view.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): May I refer the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1031 on the subject of the disregarding of the disabled employment quota and the scandalous way in which companies are ignoring the statutory requirement?

[That this House recalls that under the Disabled Persons Employment Acts of 1944 and 1958 it is unlawful for a major employer to engage a person who is not disabled if less than 3 per cent. of the workforce is made up of registered disabled people; notes that 32,922 employers qualify to meet this quota but that only 8,329 have satisfied these obligations; notes also that 18,577 exemption permits have been issued to allow avoidance of these statutes but that 18 per cent. of companies whom the Department of Employment consider should have applied for an exemption have not yet done so; notes further that since 1944 only five companies have been prosecuted for non-compliance with this statutory requirement, the largest fine imposed being £100; deplores the flagrant disregard for law displayed by management and the spineless abdication of responsibility on the part of the authorities; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to take steps at the earliest date to introduce measures to rectify such wilful neglect.]

May I also draw to the right hon. Gentleman's attention, if he has not seen it already, the answer given to me by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon Tweed (Mr. Beith), representing the House of Commons Commission, which reveals that since 1979 the Commission has never managed to do better than drawing 1 per cent. of its employees from among the disabled? As we cannot get the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed to answer on behalf of the Commission, will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement so that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed can answer questions about why the House is in dereliction of its statutory duty?

Mr. Wakeham: If the hon. Gentleman is having difficulty in obtaining answers to questions that are in order from the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I shall do what I can to facilitate answers to him.

With regard to early-day motion 1031, the quota is within the scope of the internal review of services for the disabled announced in March by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and which he has put in hand. I cannot guarantee to find time for an early debate on this matter.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): May I ask my right hon. Friend a question that relates to last night's adjourned business? Will it not become clear that, if we are to make progress on the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill and on the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill, the only way in which it could possibly be done so that the House may have the opportunity to take a decision on these Bills is if additional time is given and, perhaps, if a suspension of the ten o'clock rule is contemplated by those who have power in these matters?

Mr. Wakeham: As the Chairman of Ways and Means made clear yesterday, he is responsible for setting down private business. Standing Order No. 16 provides that business set down by the Chairman of Ways and Means "shall be distributed as nearly as may be proportionately" between Government time and Opposition time. To date, six Bills have been taken in Government time and only two in Opposition time.

My hon. Friend's request to suspend the ten o'clock rule should be a request to me from the Chairman of Ways and Means, but I am sure that I would sympathetically consider any request made by him.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I have asked the right hon. Gentleman about this before, but, in view of the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon about the housing being built in yuppie land in London, will the right hon. Gentleman give time for a debate on safety in the construction industry? Is he aware that last year 152 workers in the construction industry lost their lives and 2,300 were seriously injured? Now, in London, we are faced with another extension of self-employment in the construction industry. Is it not time that we had a proper debate on the important issue of health and safety in that industry?

Mr. Wakeham: I am not as expert as the hon. Gentleman on the construction industry. I agree that it has not had the best record on safety over the years, but I should have thought that the record shows that it has been improving in recent years. However, I shall refer what the hon. Gentleman said to my right hon. Friend, and, although I cannot promise him anything, I recognise that this is an important matter, and I shall see what we can do.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. Friend will be aware that within the past couple of days Members on both sides of the House have received the latest issue of The Parliamentarian, the journal of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, which contains a fascinating pair of articles on the development of information technology, first in the Canadian Parliament, and, secondly, in the Australian Parliament. In the Canadian Parliament it is now possible for a Member of that House not only to see what is going on in the Chamber but, if he wishes, to see what is going on simultaneously in any provincial legislature and in either House of the United States Congress. Does not that illustrate that we are rapidly falling behind in these matters? Will he bring back that central issue from the rather moribund Committee, where such matters now rest, to the Floor of the House so that we can discuss it and decide what should be done?

Mr. Wakeham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me notice that he would raise this subject. I have obtained a copy of the article to which he has referred, but I have not yet had an opportunity to read it. I know of my hon. Friend's considerable interest in this matter. He will know that computerised facilities in the Library have recently been considerably expanded, but information technology for hon. Members' own use must be a matter for individual hon. Members. I shall read the article, consider what it says and perhaps have a discusssion with my hon. Friend.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Has the Leader of the House seen the large number of Government amendments to the Firearms (Amendment) Bill? Is he aware that they amount to a rewriting of large parts of the Bill. Has he taken particular notice of the fact that, on Report, large slabs of the Bill are now to be extended to Northern Ireland, which means that those parts of the Bill will now be discussed in a new light because of the different approach to firearms in Northern Ireland? Surely, in the light of that, putting the Bill on at 7 o'clock on a Monday evening will not provide sufficient time. Will he make further time available?

Mr. Wakeham: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman. My advice is that putting it down for that time was for the general convenience of the House. We shall have to see how we get on.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland's arrogant refusal to make a statement to the House about the Anglo-Eire Conference is a denial of the democratic and parliamentary process. The Secretary of State seems to be prepared to brief the press on and off the record, but he is not prepared to brief hon. Members. Is it not time for time to be provided for a debate on the progress of the Anglo-Eire Conference so that people in Northern Ireland, through their representatives, can make their comments on it?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept for a minute my hon. Friend's comments about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. As I said last week, notwithstanding the terms of the motion that some hon. Members have put down, a full statement on the subjects discussed at the conference has been placed in the Library. As is usually the case in international discussions, the proceedings of that conference must remain confidential. However, my right hon. Friend and his Ministers are ready to talk with hon. Members about the issues raised and I recommend that my hon. Friend has a talk with my right hon. Friend about that. I cannot promise an early debate, but we shall obviously have to bear the matter in mind.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Will the Leader of the House try to arrange for the Secretary of State for the Environment to make a statement before the close of play in the Nirex consultative process on its document "The Way Forward" on the disposal of nuclear waste, particularly since there is growing evidence throughout the country that Nirex's failure to consult on the option of on-site disposal of nuclear material at existing nuclear installations is a source of concern, not least in my constituency, which today has announced a mini-referendum result of a 96 per cent. rejection on a 76 per cent. turnout of those balloted by the Electoral Reform Society?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman does not have to tell me about the controversy that some of the proposals engender, but I am not sure whether a statement in the middle of the consultation process is the best way forward. I shall have a word with my right hon. Friend to see whether he has any proposals to make.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): May I ask my right hon. Friend about his answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine)? If the Government are not prepared to find extra time for the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, and if they are not prepared to allow compensatory time which would at least get us through the series of votes to be taken and the Third Reading, have the Government any intention of bringing forward proposals of their own on this subject, or is my right hon. Friend saying to the country and to the House —I want to be clear about this—that, despite 109 hon. Members already having signed the motion asking for extra time on the first day that it was down, despite the majority on Second Reading, and despite the widespread anxiety in the country over this matter, the Government and my right hon. Friend are giving this issue no priority?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sure that, if my hon. Friend thinks about it in a wider context than the Abortion (Amendment) Bill—about which I know she is very concerned—she will recognise that the Government's position on not giving additional time for private Members' Bills is based on very careful and detailed thought, and should not lightly be put aside. I have said that there will be a further chance tomorrow for the House to reach a decision, and I think that that is the best way to proceed today.

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): Will the Leader of the House reconsider the reply that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), and give some thought to ways in which the removal of Crown immunity can apply to the Palace of Westminster? Some 10,000 meals are served here every day. This is a place of work for many hundreds of people. No criticism is implied of the staff of the Refreshment Department, but I believe that this place should have the same legislative protection as public premises and food premises elsewhere. There is no substitute for proper inspections, monitoring and enforcement of legislation.

Mr. Wakeham: I believe that the staff and officers of the House conduct their duties to the highest standards, and they certainly have my full support. I would not accept any implied criticism, and I know that the hon. Lady did not intend such a criticism. I cannot give an answer immediately on whether legislation should be introduced. The hon. Lady has asked for a request to be made, and I will consider the matter, but I do not promise anything much.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Is it the case that under the present Government no national controversial question can be settled by the private Members' Bill procedure, because the Government will in no circumstances allow Back Benchers to decide such matters, except when consenting to provide extra time? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Government's predecessors never shirked their responsibility in this way? Have not the Government a moral duty at least to allow further discussion of the Abortion (Amendment) Bill so that this great question may be decided?

Mr. Wakeham: I hear and take note of what my hon. Friend has said, but I do not think that I can add anything more. It is not this Government's practice to provide additional time, but the House will have an opportunity on Friday to come to a conclusion on the matter if it wishes.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware—[Laughter.] What is wrong with that? He has been a friend for a long while. Hon. Members should keep quiet. Is he aware that we had a marvellous debate last night on the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill? The Government appeared to be supporting the Bill last night, and had a payroll vote ready in case it was needed. Bearing in mind what the Leader of the House said about the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, will the Government find time for this Bill to be further considered?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know from where the hon. Gentleman obtains his information. He is usually very well informed, but I am not sure that he is as well informed on this issue as he is on confectionery and other matters that may be more in his line.

As I said, time for private Bills is a matter for the Chairman of Ways and Means and the Standing Orders of the House, and I have no doubt that those responsible will conduct their duties properly.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): In view of the problems in monopoly and merger policy caused by the fact that the Director General of Fair Trading has said that he may be unable to give a verdict on the bids for Rowntree for another fortnight, would my right hon. Friend be willing to have an early debate on the matter? Does he agree that the undertainty generated by that delay is unfortunate for the management and employees of Rowntree?

Mr. Wakeham: I accept that delay and uncertainty should not be perpetuated longer than is necessary. However, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, we must also stick rigidly to the law, and I do not believe that a debate at this stage would be helpful.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House make a statement on the introduction of legislation to ensure that when people cross the floor, either in this place or in local councils, from one party to another they seek to maintain their mandate by going to the electorate again? This is a matter of political integrity. That would prevent political cheating when people who have been elected on one set of values in a manifesto then tear up that manifesto, kick the electorate in the teeth and cross the floor. Is it not reasonable for the electorate to expect legislation to require people to seek re-election when they do not have the guts to do it themselves?

Mr. Wakeham: It sounds to me as if the hon. Gentleman is trying to plug some holes in a sinking ship. I do not have any plans for such legislation.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Further to the point raised by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), and in view of the large amount of time-wasting by Labour Members yesterday, including the raising of a large number of dubious points of order, does my right hon. Friend agree that, when the debate is resumed on the private Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), there is a good case for allowing it to take place in Opposition time?

Mr. Wakeham: Standing Order No. 16 makes it clear how time should be apportioned between the Government and the Opposition. I have already said that, to date, six private Bills have been taken in Government time and only two in Opposition time. However, the questions that my hon. Friend has raised are for the Chairman of Ways and Means, and not for me.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): In light of the public concern that is now being expressed in Kent about reductions in public services, in education and in expenditure in parts of the hospital service in every part of Kent, will the Leader of the House give hon. Members, especially Labour Members, time to debate these matters? Our mail bags are increasingly being filled with correspondence from people who are angry about the Government's activities in Kent.

Mr. Wakeham: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was a Member for another beautiful part of the country, but perhaps he is not as welcome there as he was. I entirely reject what he has said about Kent. I know Kent very well, and a number of my hon. Friends who represent Kent constituencies recognise the many great achievements of the Government for the benefit of the people of that area.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to motion no. 14 on the Order Paper, which is in his name. If motion no. 14 had been debated and carried prior to last Friday, the sad events of that day would not have taken place because it would have prevented time wasting on petitions. I believe that it would be a good thing for the standing of the House in the country if that motion were debated at the earliest opportunity to prevent Friday's sad events from happening again.

Mr. Wakeham: I agree with my hon. Friend. The motion reflects the views of the all-party Procedure Committee. I believe that the motion is generally acceptable as being the way forward. As I have said on many occasions, I deprecate the use of petitions as a means of filibustering.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): Will the Leader of the House reflect on the statement that he made last week—he repeated it today—that it would not be right for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to come to the House to make a statement following meetings of the Anglo-Irish Conference? What is not right about the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland doing what Prime Ministers and Foreign Secretaries have done regularly in this House since I became a Member? Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that, instead of the House being given an opportunity to probe the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about his relationship with the Government of the Irish Republic, Members representing Northern Ireland will, if they crawl to Stormont Castle, be given their own private briefing? Is that what passes for British parliamentary democracy today?

Mr. Wakeham: I believe that the hon. Gentleman is trying to turn the particular into the general. I was talking about the particular position as it was last week. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland makes statements in this House and he will continue to do so. The basis for making Government statements is that the Government believe it is right that they should be made. I can only repeat what I have said before. My right hon. Friend is always ready to talk to hon. Members if they believe that that would be helpful.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect on the answer that he has given to my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker), bearing in mind that hon. Members from another party—the Social and Democratic Labour party—can run off to Dublin to see the Prime Minister of that country? He can tell them the full details of the matters that were raised and take them totally into his confidence. Yet the Members of this House who are Unionists cannot be trusted with the information, which I believe all hon. Members should be given. Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect upon his answer and give the House the courtesy that it deserves?

Mr. Wakeham: The duties of the Leader of the House do not extend as far as discussions that go on in Dublin. I will reflect upon what the hon. Gentleman has said if he undertakes to reflect upon what I have said: if he wishes to talk about such matters my right hon. Friend is ready and willing to see him.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Has the Leader of the House had time to read recent authoritative press statements about the fact that 10 major nuclear power stations are defective in construction and are unsafe? Is he aware of the grave public concern that that has caused? Is it the Government's intention to make a statement about those power stations, and are they prepared to give the House time to debate this serious matter?

Mr. Wakeham: I assure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy makes safety the highest priority in nuclear matters. If he thought that there was any cause for alarm or need to make a statement to the House, he would be the first to do so. I do not believe that there is any such necessity, but I shall certainly refer the hon. Gentleman's concern to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Will my right hon. Friend give time for a debate on our former prisoners of war in the far east? There has been a lobby on that matter today and when I took a small party to the Japanese embassy I was enormously surprised to discover the public concern that still exists because these people have not been properly looked after and compensated. May we have time for a debate on this subject?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that there is concern about this matter. I cannot promise an early debate, but I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I wish to raise with the Leader of the House a subject which has been discussed on a number of occasions, the Economic League. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that obvious blocking tactics are being employed in the Employment Select Committee to prohibit a proper investigation of that private espionage organisation, which has affected the livelihood of thousands of people? Is there some kind of cover-up, or does the Leader of the House intend to do something to bring about an end to this scandal?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman refers me to what is going on in the Employment Select Committee. What he said sounded to me as a slightly partial account of matters. I do not have responsibility for taking the Chair of the Employment Select Committee. It is not a matter for me.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): When my right hon. Friend considers the request from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) concerning the New Zealand dairy industry, will he also bear in mind the plight of the New Zealand apple industry? It has several shiploads of extremely good New Zealand apples on the sea and they are likely to be banned from landing because of the new quotas that are being slapped on by the European Community. That is happening at a time when there is a growing shortage of good apples. If the ban operates, we will be eating pappy, rotten, Golden Delicious apples instead of good New Zealand apples.

Mr. Wakeham: I agree with my hon. Friend about the quality of New Zealand apples. I do not think that I can arrange a debate on the subject next week, but I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Leader of the House persuade his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement to the House on the problem of cones and bollards on the M6 and the M1? The right hon. Gentleman may not be aware that the number of contraflow systems on those two roads is increasing, and there are dangers from service stations, with vehicles pouring into two-lane contraflow systems. A considerable number of people are killed on the roads during the summer. It is a matter of great importance for those of us who represent constituencies in the north-west.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that when unfortunately one gets into a traffic jam one tends to take a partial view of these matters, but I would have thought that the increase in expenditure on roads, and particularly on motorways, in this country was one of the Government's great achievements. I will refer the matter to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): My right hon. Friend may recall that some weeks ago he made some sympathetic comments about the need for a debate on air traffic. Since then public concern about the number of air misses has increased and anxiety has been expressed over the difficulties of American airlines in running scheduled services to Manchester. There is a report under consideration about the extension of time for Leeds-Bradford airport. These are very important national and regional issues. When may we expect his expressions of sympathy to be translated into a debate?

Mr. Wakeham: The expressions of sympathy still apply, but I cannot foresee an early debate. However, it is important that all those factors are discussed when the opportunity presents itself, particularly as the substantial increase in air traffic and the far less substantial increase in risk is not fully appreciated by many people in this country.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): The Leader of the House will recall that before the general election last year the Environment Select Committee published a report on river and estuary pollution. As yet the Government have not published a response to that report, although it is way beyond the time limit allowed. Will he urge the Secretary of State to ensure that the report is published as soon as possible? Recognising the serious implications of the privatisation of water, if the Government press ahead with that legislation, will he seriously consider providing time for that report and the Government's response to it to be debated?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is right in recognising that these are very important, serious matters and need properly to be considered. I am sorry if the Government's response has been delayed. I will refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and see what can be done.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Returning to early-day motion 1086 about the circumstances concerning the Abortion (Amendment) Bill last week, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) about the procedure of the House? Will he arrange for the Procedure Committee's motion to be brought before the House as soon as possible so that consideration may be given to the ways in which the procedure of the House can be changed to prevent a repetition of the time-wasting, filibustering disruption of the Bill last week so that we can come to a decision on this important matter?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend has noticed that the motion to re-establish the Select Committee on Procedure is on the Order Paper. I hope that it will be agreed within the next few days so that the Committee can start work.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will the Leader of the House accept that my colleagues on this Bench would like to vote on the Abortion (Amendment) Bill and decide once and for all where we stand?

I have raised before the question of having a debate in the House on the role of the media in reporting terrorist incidents, and, more importantly, in providing a platform for exponents of terror. Can the right hon. Gentleman find time for us to debate that matter in the near future?

Since apparently it is not possible for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to make a statement on the recent Anglo-Eire Conference meeting, is it possible for a debate on Northern Ireland to be arranged in the comparatively near future? If that cannot be done through the usual channels, perhaps the unusual channels will bring more success. Perhaps we could debate the novel doctrine that is now being propounded of the immutability of international agreements lodged at the United Nations, especially in light of the recent one between New Zealand and France.

Mr. Wakeham: If we had such a debate, it seems that the hon. Gentleman would have plenty to say. I take his point. I cannot promise him an early debate, but I shall certainly bear in mind what he has said.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): My right hon. Friend will be aware that on Bank Holiday Monday a lump of aircraft fell in a garden in my constituency, a matter that is being investigated by the Department of Transport and the Civil Aviation Authority thoroughly and, so far, to the satisfaction of my constituents. Is he aware that the response from the airline, Iceland Air, is entirely a matter for that airline under the Civil Aviation Act 1980 and that its response so far can be described only as mean-minded, ungenerous and, frankly, uncaring? Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on whether the airlines should have greater responsibility for what happens to gardens and the areas over which they fly?

Mr. Wakeham: Since my hon. Friend has been a Member of the House he has shown himself to be a very adept user of the procedures of the House. May I suggest that what he has said may be an appropriate subject for an Adjournment debate?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Leader of the House has received a number of complaints from hon. Members about the Government giving more time for the Abortion (Amendment) Bill. Does he agree with me that in the time that we have been Members of the House many controversial Back-Bench Members' Bills have been introduced, and most of them have suffered the same fate? Bills about hare coursing and fox hunting and industrial relations Bills introduced by Opposition Members between 1976 and 1979 were defeated on the simple basis that if there is too much controversy about them it does not take too many people to stop them. I remember the Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), speaking for three hours to stop a Bill. This happens on both sides of the House.

I think that it should be clearly understood that if last Friday the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr.

[Mr. Dennis Skinner]

Alton) had been smart enough, as we suggested in the Lobby when we spoke about the matter, and voted in the opposite manner from the way he did, he might have had a forlorn hope of carrying it further, but he went into the wrong Lobby.

Mr. Wakeham: It is well worth the time of anybody seeking to understand properly the procedures of the House to have a private word with the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). He has a better knowledge of the proceedings of the House than he has about a great many other things outside the House on which he expresses strong views from time to time.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): Is the Leader of the House aware that yet again hon. Members have had to put up with ministerial statements about the privatisation of public assets being made outside the House before they are discussed by the House, notably on the privatisation of the coal industry? Bearing in mind that most hon. Members do not agree with such action, will he find time very soon to debate coal mining subsidence, especially since the Select Committee report, the Government's response to that report and the consultation about the Government's response is imminent? It is vital that the issue is discussed in this Chamber.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Energy, who spoke about the possible privatisation of the coal industry, was not in any sense making a specific announcement about it. It is no secret that the Government believe that in the long term that would be a sensible, profitable and efficient way forward for those in the industry, but we recognise that privatisation would be technically and administratively a very complex and lengthy process and it could not happen in this Parliament. From time to time we find time for debates on the coal industry, but I cannot promise a debate in the near future.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Has the Leader of the House had time to examine early-day motion 1088 concerning the new political situation in Scotland since the district election results last week?

[That this House notes the results of the Scottish district elections, and in particular the performance of the Scottish National Party; notes that the Scottish National Party is now the second party in Scotland, having won 21·2 per cent. of the vote, compared with the Tories' 19·1 per cent.; notes that both Conservative and Labour parties suffered a fall in support despite both having increased their total number of candidates; notes that more Scots expressed ballot box support for a mass campaign of non-payment to resist the poll tax than voted to support the measure itself; further notes that the latest MORI opinion poll indicates levels of support for full Scottish independence running at a record high 35 per cent. among voters; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to provide Parliamentary time so that the new political situation and the Government's lack of legitimacy in Scotland can properly be discussed by honourable Members.]

Given that the Conservative party is the third party in Scotland in terms of popular support, and is behind the Labour party and the Scottish National party, is it not time for a debate on the legitimacy of the Government's position and the imposition on the Scottish people of extremist policies which are so clearly rejected and unwanted?

Mr. Wakeham: I have to say to the hon. Gentleman, even if he knows it already, that 69 out of the 72 Scottish Members at Westminster were elected last June to represent the Scottish people as Unionists in the United Kingdom Parliament. There is no new political situation in Scotland. The Scottish National party had a record number of candidates, but it failed dismally to replace the Scottish Conservative party as the second force in Scottish politics. The SNP's policy of independence has consistently been rejected by the Scottish people.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): The Leader of the House will have probably seen the CEGB's announcement that it is going forward with plans for two new pressurised water reactor nuclear power stations. That is a matter of considerable concern to the House not only in terms of safety and viability but also because it pre-empts the decision of the House on the privatisation of the industry and the Government's intention to increase the input of independent suppliers and generators of electricity. Will he seek to make time available for the House to debate these moves by the CEGB?

Mr. Wakeham: Those are important matters and we shall no doubt debate them in one form or another. However, I should like to consider what is the best way forward, and I cannot promise an early debate.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May we have a statement next week on who has ministerial or Cabinet responsibility for scolding, lecturing, hectoring and pontificating against the broadcasters—the BBC, the Independent Television Authority, Lord Thomson of Monifieth and the press? Is it the Home Secretary, who has preserved a discreet and genteel silence, is it the Foreign Secretary, or is it Mr. Ingham? May we have a statement on the precise role of Mr. Ingham? In particular, may we have an answer to the question whether his well-publicised statement last week about press hysteria was made on the authority of the Prime Minister? Was it done with her authority, or did he do it on his tod?

Mr. Wakeham: If there were any Minister with ministerial responsibility for scolding, I think that he would be tempted to scold rather nearer home than the media further away. When my right hon. Friends speak to the broadcasting authorities, they speak to them in a calm and responsible way. They put forward what they believe to be appropriate matters that should be considered. I do not recognise the language that the hon. Gentleman uses.

Dairy Crest Creamery, Llangefni

4.22 pm

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the imminent loss of 200 jobs in the dairy industry in Wales, in the light of yesterday's decision on the implementation of the recent agreement between the Milk Marketing Board and the Dairy Trade Federation."

The matter is specific, in that it relates to the problems that have arisen over the sale of the Dairy Crest Creamery in Llangefni in my constituency. In January, Dairy Crest announced that the creamery would close on 31 March, with the loss of 46 jobs. The site has been marketed by the Welsh Development Agency on the basis that any buyer could use the site to make any products, with the exception of butter and powdered milk.

On 28 April it seemed that the deal could go through, thus saving a substantial number of jobs in my constituency, yet within 24 hours the deal was put on ice because the Dairy Trade Federation, which entered into an agreement on rationalisation with the Milk Marketing Board and which owns Dairy Crest, objected to Dairy Crest being paid compensation if it sold the site to anybody who wished to use the milk.

It is an important matter because it has critical implications for the dairy industry, in that somebody who is prepared to purchase the site is apparently being blocked, due to the industry's big boys falling out. As not only jobs but the control of the dairy sector and the distribution of milk are at stake, the House should be given an opportunity to debate it.

It is an urgent matter, because yesterday talks between the parties—the Milk Marketing Board and the Dairy Trade Federation—broke down, and unless there is an early resumption of talks aimed at a resolution of the dispute, jobs in my constituency could be in jeopardy.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) seeks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the imminent loss of 200 jobs in the dairy industry in Wales, in the light of yesterday's decision on the implementation of the recent agreement between the Milk Marketing Board and the Dairy Trade Federation."

I have listened with concern to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House. I hope that he will find other ways of raising it.

Firearms (Amendment) Bill

4.24 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have gathered from my questions to the Leader of the House that I am worried about the extension to Northern Ireland of certain clauses of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill. I seek your guidance on the procedure that may be used.

You will remember that in Committee these particular clauses and subsections were closely scrutinised, but only in the context of Great Britain. They are now to be extended to Northern Ireland. If that had happened initially, there would have been detailed discussions of the implications for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland's firearms owners and dealers.

As the context of the legislation has been changed, would it be in order to table and to have selected the amendments that were selected and discussed in Committee so that the effect of this extension of the legislation to Northern Ireland can be fully considered?

Mr. Speaker: Before I could make a judgment, I should need to see the amendments. If the hon. Gentleman cares to submit his amendments, they will be considered in the usual way, with all the others. However, I note what he has said about the matter.

BILL PRESENTED

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER (REMOVAL OF CROWN IMMUNITY)

Ms. Joan Walley, supported by Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Allan Roberts, Mr. Donald Anderson, Ms. Joan Ruddock, Mr. Paul Flynn, Mr. Alistair Darling, Dr. John Marek, Mr. Calum Macdonald, Mr. Andrew Smith, Ms. Jo Richardson and Mr. Chris Smith, presented a Bill to remove Crown immunity from the Palace of Westminster in relation to the Health and Safety at Work &c. Act 1974, the Food Act 1984 and other enactments relating to public health and safety, and regulations made thereunder; and to make the Palace liable to inspection by the relevant enforcing authorities: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 July, and to be printed. [Bill 164.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c

Ordered,

Prisons

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

4.26 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Last night just over 50,000 people were held in prisons or as prisoners in police cells in England and Wales. The prison system is designed to hold around 44,200. The result is that parts of the prison system are miserably and dangerously overcrowded. That is the heart of a problem as serious as any that confronts the Government on the domestic scene. So it is entirely right that Parliament should debate the problem and the Government's response.

Prisons are a world of which most people still prefer to know little. But silence and ignorance about prisons have in the past led to neglect. I have come to the conclusion that I would rather face criticism of the state of the prisons than silence. That is one reason why I decided last year to make possible the publication of individual reports of boards of visitors, such as the report on Wandsworth last month. Out of informed debate will come understanding of all that the prison service and the Government are doing to remedy the situation, and pressure to do more. If there had been proper debate in the mid-1970s, when crime was rising fast and the prisons filling, perhaps the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) and his predecessor would not have had to cut the prison building programme in the way that they did. I welcome the opportunity to set out briefly what we are doing first to restrain the growth of the prison population in ways that have to be reconciled with the independence of magistrates and judges and, second, to increase and speed up the provision of prison places.

Let me first deal with one distortion that sometimes creeps in. The problem is not unique to the United Kingdom. Figures are not strictly comparable, but the most recent information shows that the prison population per 100,000 inhabitants in the United Kingdom, at 96, was the fourth highest among Council of Europe states; for seven of these member states, including France and Germany, the rate was over 80 per 100,000 inhabitants. I believe that our imprisonment rate is lower than that of Canada and well below that of the United States, which had a prison population of about 300 per 100,000 inhabitants in 1985, compared with our 96. Our prison population has been growing much more slowly in the past four years than that of France, Holland, Ireland or Portugal. We have plenty of problems, but I hope that we shall hear no more of the notion that our prison system is in some way uniquely severe or barbarous; it is not.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The right hon. Gentleman said that his objective is to restrain the growth of inmate numbers in prison. Is he aware that many who know a great deal about the prison system believe not simply that the rate of growth should be restrained but that the prison population should be reduced? Is that not even the medium-term target of the Government?

Mr. Hurd: If the hon. Gentleman catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, I shall be fascinated to hear how he intends to do that in a way that can be reconciled with the independence of magistrates and judges. I am sure that he favours that independence. He might be able to explain to the House how he would propose to reconcile the two. I hope to cover the point in greater substance later. Before that, I shall analyse briefly the composition of the 50,000 people in prison or police cells.

In round numbers, 11,000 have not been sentenced, and have been refused bail awaiting trial or sentence. That remand population has nearly doubled since 1980. Some 15,000 of the 50,000 have been sentenced for violent offences and the rest are in prison for non-violent offences. Of those, 9,000 are burglars and 7,000 are in prison for theft and related offences.

Before I come to the different categories, I shall underline a crucial principle, which bears on what the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) has said. The Lord Chancellor, the Attorney-General and the Home Secretary preside in different ways over an amazingly decentralised criminal justice system, each component of which is proud and jealous of its independence. The Lord Chancellor does not direct the judges, the Attorney-General does not direct the lawyers and I do not direct the police. The public, even hon. Members, are often surprised at the limits in our powers.

I am not in favour of centralising those powers. I am strongly in favour of the different parts of the system getting to know the other parts better. Magistrates and judges, for example, ought to know better than they sometimes do what actually follows when a burglar is sent to prison in 1988. Probation officers ought to be able to read the minds of magistrates and understand why they sometimes reject advice against a prison sentence couched in the vocabulary of the social worker.

My colleagues and I are working hard to intensify these contacts and to show each of the professions in the criminal justice system that isolation is not a necessary condition of independence. We want to break down the isolation, but not undermine the independence. I believe that it would be wrong for me to seek to prevent the courts from sending to prison those for whom they believe, after considering all the alternatives, prison to be the right place.

Parliament has provided powers to authorise the early release of certain inmates, that is, those not convicted of serious offences of a violent nature or involving drugs. Parliament thought that those powers should be available. But we have always made it clear that they are for use in an emergency and not simply to keep the prison population below some arbitrary figure. Here I differ from the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland, as I do not believe that it is for the Home Secretary to say, "There are only 44,000 decent places in the prison system; therefore you, the judiciary, must not send more people to prison than that, however convinced you are that a prison sentence is necessary in a particular case for deterrence, punishment or the protection of the public."

However, I can hope to provide sentencers with more persuasive options outside prison. For the rest, we need to supply the prison places that the sentences of the court require. It is the courts, not the Government, who decide who should go to prison. We have to ensure as a Government, and indeed as a Parliament, that the courts have a range of penalties available to them so that they can give suitable sentences to the wide variety of offenders who come before them. But it is for the courts to weigh all the circumstances of each offence, to take account of aggravating and mitigating factors and then to fix the sentence.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Does the Home Secretary agree that some of the alternatives could be bail hostels or drug and alcohol rehabilitation centres, which would give options to the courts for independent decisions? The right hon. Gentleman is aware that I am especially concerned about the conditions in Brixton prison. For example, there have been 27 deaths by suicide or misadventure in the remand prison since 1981. There is a special problem in F wing. Can the right hon. Gentleman assure me, further to his written answer to me of 13 April, that he will undertake a public inquiry into the conditions in F wing and the deaths that have occurred in the past two years?

Mr. Hurd: Suicides are a tragedy and a disaster wherever they occur, and particularly when they occur in prison. I am especially concerned about the position in Risley and Brixton prisons. Difficulties are greatest in those remand centres for reasons that the hon. Gentleman knows. Last year we introduced a new strategy for the prevention of suicide among inmates. The hon. Gentleman knows the details. It is fixed on the idea that more contact and care by staff, and the care that prisoners can take among themselves when a possibility of suicide has been identified, will make suicides less likely.

It is too early to be sure how this strategy is working. Last year was a very bad year for suicides in the prison system. So far this year there have been 10 apparent suicides, unfortunately including one yesterday, compared with 19 at this stage in 1987. It is too early to be sure how well the new strategy is working, but we certainly have to keep it under particular review, not so much prison by prison, although that comes into it, but in the general strategy.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. Hurd: I want to get on. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman later; I may well cover prison regimes again later and perhaps he could interrupt me then.

I turn to the 15,000 violent offenders in prison. I do not believe that there is scope for reducing the numbers of this category in prison until the number of violent offences begins to come down. Indeed, the increasing severity of sentences in respect of serious violence certainly reflects the revulsion which we all feel generally about such crimes, particularly when the victims are the elderly or children. Since 1980, the length of Crown court sentences for offences of violence committed by men over 21 has increased by 12 per cent. The increase for offences of robbery has been particularly marked at 21 per cent. Nine out of 10 men convicted of robbery in the Crown court are sent to prison. The Crown court is more likely than it was to send men convicted of sexual offences to prison and to keep them there longer. The average sentence for rape has increased by 30 per cent. in the past two years. In the Criminal Justice Bill we propose to give the Court of Appeal the power to increase sentences for serious offences when referred to them by the Attorney-General, on the ground that they appear waywardly lenient.

I would put drug trafficking in the same category of seriousness. We have increased the maximum penalties for drug trafficking and that has been reflected by longer sentences in the courts. One of the results has been a significant increase in the number of women in prison serving longer sentences for drug offences. Unfortunately, traffickers tend to pick out women and use them as their couriers because they hope that women are less likely to be detected. In the Government's view, there is a substantial category for which prison sentences,, and in some cases longer prison sentences are inevitable and necessary. For the 23,000 prisoners whose offences are not violent, the policy must be different. It is not self-evident that all these men and women should be in prison.

We need to build on the many excellent programmes that some probation services have already developed for supervising high-risk offenders based on the probation order. We are encouraging an expansion in the number of day centres in England and Wales. We have made available new money to approve four new projects in 1988-89. We have asked the probation service to put forward proposals for other new projects in later years. Probation committees have been told that priority will be given to approving those new projects which target young adults and offer strict, structured regimes, aimed at reducing reoffending. Such schemes make young adults face the consequences of their offending behaviour and aim to alter criminal attitudes. Some offenders may need closer supervision, especially at the start of the order.

I am also particularly keen to support the development of community service orders. That is one of the major achievements of the probation service. We have decided that the time has come to draw the reins a bit tighter. We want to bring practice in all parts of the country up to the standard of the best. That is why we circulated draft national standards for the operation of community service schemes. We want to ensure that community service is rigorous and demanding. The need for frequent and punctual reporting is part of the discipline imposed by the order. The work to be done should be useful and bring benefit to the community. There is no reparation if the work itself is pointless. Ideally, the public should be able to see the results of the work and, in the process, the offender's self-discipline and motivation should be improved.

Imagine the case of the young opportunist burglar whose burglary involves no violence. His offence is still serious. The court will always want to consider the nature of the offence, consider the victim, and look hard at the offender. If the court decides that he must go to prison, we should not make that impossible, and we must provide a prison place. It is true that while he is in prison he will not burgle the citizen, and that is a powerful argument in the minds of the police, the judiciary and the decent citizen. But if, by putting him in a cell at great expense for a few months, with one or two other burglars, we simply turn out a more skilful and enterprising burglar, the citizen may actually have struck a rather poor bargain—a worse bargain, perhaps, than if the man had been sentenced to a severe but useful punishment in the community. The courts should make that choice case by case, but with options before them that are much more persuasive than those that they have at the moment.

Then there are the 11,000—this is my final category —who are awaiting trial or sentence. That is too high a figure. No hon. Member would believe that that is a sensible figure. It is more than one in five of the total. I cannot advise magistrates on individual decisions on bail. We have looked at the Bail Act 1976, and we think that the balance in it is right. Magistrates know that we would wish to reduce the remand population and provide proper support to magistrates so that they are able to make the best possible decisions on bail. There is plenty of scope for better information through bail information schemes. I am also providing resources for about nine new bail hostels. We are considering whether some others could be privately managed. The Lord Chancellor is preparing improved training for magistrates on bail decisions. Yesterday, I issued to magistrates courts a circular bringing together the threads of these developments.

The continuing rise in the remand population has been caused in part by the increased time that individuals have spent in custody awaiting trial. That is why, under the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, we took power to introduce statutory time limits in England and Wales. We first exercised that power in April last year and monitored the effects of the time limits and the first results have been encouraging.

On 1 April, I extended custody time limits to Greater Manchester, throughout Wales, to Cheshire, Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Gloucestershire, Hampshire, the Isle of Wight, and Wiltshire, reduced the limit to committal in the west midlands from 98 to 84 days, and extended the operation of limits to Coventry and Dudley Crown court centres. We shall continue to phase in the time limits and hope that, by 1990, they will be in force throughout England and Wales. When we can actually move them downwards—tighten up the times—we shall do so. That should lead to a fall of up to 600 in the remand population.

I have dealt with the first objective, which is how to restrain the growth or, if we can, reduce the size of the prison population, while respecting the independence of magistrates and judges. I now refer to the other side of the policy, which is the provision of prison places. We have had to put in hand a major programme to bring that about, because, unlike our predecessors, we regard it as a duty that we must face. In the years since 1979, expenditure on the prison service has risen in real terms, after inflation, by 43 per cent. That compares with an increase of 11 per cent. between 1974 and 1979.

The figures are even more dramatic for expenditure on prison building, including the refurbishment of existing establishments. Under the Labour Government, there was a decrease of 35 per cent. in real terms in such expenditure. In contrast, since 1979, expenditure on prison building has risen by 117 per cent. in real terms. When one puts it into actual cash, one sees that the figures are getting large. This year, financial provision is £802 million. We plan to increase it to £937 million by 1990-91. That increase will enable us to carry through the biggest prison building programme this century, gradually to improve the conditions in which prisoners are held and to try to reduce the problem of severe overcrowding, which has existed in many of our prisons for many years.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): I wonder whether the Home Secretary is satisfied that the rebuilding programme is in the right, competent, professional hands. On a recent visit, we saw for ourselves the appalling design of Holloway C wing. It is detrimental to those who work in the prison and to the inmates. It is scandalous. Only a few days ago, there was a report of a new prison being built for £30 million. Building faults have already appeared. The design will certainly not improve the quality of life of those who work in the prison or of those who must be there. Is there not something wrong with a system that can allow buildings of that kind to continue at vast public expense when, in some cases, they are worse than the buildings that have been replaced?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend carries his argument too far. It is certainly true that, in the 1960s and, perhaps, early 1970s, prison design in this country went through a phase that everybody now regrets. There were attempts to build prisons in ways that proved to be unsuitable. We have learnt a lesson in two respects. The present designs, including the design of Full Sutton, are considerably better than they were. Full Sutton prison was designed four and a half years ago. One is continually learning. We cannot constantly interfere with the design of a prison while it is being built or we will never get it. I am coming to the ways in which we are improving designs and improving and accelerating the provision of prison places. I am satisfied that Full Sutton, which is the prison to which my hon. Friend was referring, is a wholly secure prison. When he visits it, as I hope that he will before long, he will be impressed by it. I hope that he will be even more impressed as the years pass and we open prisons that are designed even later.

I return to the point that I had reached. The programme will provide 26 new prisons by the mid-1990s. But that is not enough. We must also—this meets my hon. Friend's point—modernise and improve what we already have, much of which is in a bad way. The refurbishment and expansion of existing establishments will provide a further 8,000 places by 1995 and start to bring the prison estate up to 20th century standards. We shall be providing 22,000 new places by the mid-1990s, at a cost of about £1 billion. That is improvement of quality as well as of quantity.

We have to tackle the degrading practice of slopping out. By 1995, about 75 per cent. of prison places will have access to sanitation, compared with just 43 per cent. in 1979. The main obstacle to faster progress on sanitation, which is crucial, is the need to move all the prisoners from a wing to enable integral sanitation to be installed. There has to be somewhere to move the prisoners to, and that can cause disruption in the very establishments that suffer most from the growth in population. In response to that worry, we are beginning soon two pilot schemes, in Brixton and Wandsworth, to test the feasibility of a new way of installing sanitation that will not require the closure of wings and could be achieved separately from bigger refurbishment plans.

I do not believe that it is sensible to be content with financial figures, as if we were simply throwing money at the problem. We have to achieve greater efficiency in prison building. We have set up a design brief team to update and rationalise prison design. The Prisons Building Board, which has a private sector element, will supervise delivery of the programme. I am urgently considering how we can involve the private sector more closely in the prison system. The new Prisons Building Board includes three business men with strong practical experience. It has invited the private sector to make proposals for building remand or open facilities more quickly than in the past. We have already had over 30 responses. I intend before long to publish a Green Paper on private sector involvement in all aspects of the remand system, including possible management. We are engaging consultants to help in working out the practical implications.

Meanwhile, as the House knows from the exchanges that we had just before Easter, we have run seriously short of space. The continual growth of the prison population has put pressure on regimes in all parts of the system. I have mentioned the pressures on living accommodation and sanitary facilities, which lead to interruptions in education classes, workshops and other worthwhile activities.

The number committed to prison by the courts was rising at a rate equivalent to the population of an average-sized prison every few weeks during the earlier part of this year. As an unavoidable, but undesirable, overflow, more and more prisoners were being held in police cells. That number reached the very high figure of 1,575 early in March. Therefore, urgent short-term action was necessary to prevent a breakdown in the prisons and reduce the burden on the police. That is why I announced to the House the opening of two army camps in the south —at Rollestone on Salisbury plain, which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary visited yesterday, and at Alma Dettingen, near Camberley—as temporary prisons, for a matter of months, to house about 700 prisoners.

I should like to pay a tribute to all those concerned for the enormous efforts made in converting these camps and bringing them into use very quickly indeed. Rollestone opened on 25 April and Alma Dettingen on 9 May. Partly as a result of that, but only partly, the number of prisoners in police cells has fallen, I am glad to say, from that peak of 1,575 to 957 yesterday. It is still far too high and I shall not be happy until the use of police cells for prisoners is regarded as something exceptional and temporary.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I am sorry that, unavoidably, I missed the first part of my right hon. Friend's speech. Could he comment on the fact that the Wiltshire county council's social services department and probation service have also been involved in the Rollestone camp and have played a very important part, particularly those seconded from Evlestoke open prison?

Mr. Hurd: One of the reasons why I decided that we should open Rollestone again was precisely the co-operation that we had on an earlier occasion from all the authorities in Wiltshire, and the generally good relations that were built up with my hon. Friend's constituents. I gladly thank, through him, all those who have been involved again.

It is not just a question of buildings and emergency arrangements such as I have described. A rising prison population needs not only more buildings but more staff, and we have increased the number of prison officers by 22 per cent. over a period when the number of inmates has increased by 15 per cent. So, contrary to the impression that one sometimes receives from some people, the ratio has been steadily improving.

I am very well aware of staffing difficulties in a number of prisons. Recruitment of prison officers is at its highest ever level. Last year we recruited 1,860 officers to deal with wastage and meet the needs of new work. This year we plan to recruit a further 1,360 over and above replacements needed for people who leave or retire. In addition, more will be needed to staff the new accommodation that I announced in my statement of 30 March. We are committed to providing the staff that the service needs and there will be a continuing demand for recruits to staff new accommodation.

But prison staffing is not just a matter of numbers. We have to make the best use of the staff available and ensure that they enjoy the right terms and conditions of service for their demanding work. That is why over the past year we have brought about a radical change in the way that the prison service is organised and run.

Fresh Start is our response to a service that was beset by an increasing workload and costs and hampered by inefficient and inflexible systems and structures. Those who were managing it were frustrated by the rigidities, waste and obstacles built into the system. Staff, highly committed though they are, were faced with long working hours and little job satisfaction. We are bringing about a huge change, comparable with any change in the public or private sector during this time. Fresh Start is what it says —a chance to start again—and the service is, with difficulty, getting to grips with this fact and seizing the opportunities that if offers to improve life for staff.

Mr. Bermingham: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept my question in the spirit in which it is intended. In the calculation of staff required for the foreseeable future, did his Department take into account that, with the increasing detection rate by the police forces in the United Kingdom, there will be an increasing number of prisoners, because there will be more convictions in the courts?

Mr. Hurd: I am glad that the hon. Member agrees that the clear-up rate is improving. He is certainly right in that. As we try to plan the future under different possibilities and try to take into account the aspects that may change over the coming years, of course we take that fact into account.

I was dealing with Fresh Start——

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend just before he finishes, but what he was saying goes back to what was said earlier about the buildings that we are using. One of the things that I had hoped for today was to hear that one day we might start pulling down some of the Victorian prisons or, if we cannot do that, at least installing some of the electronic door-keeping techniques, and so on, that are used in the United States so that we do not need to have vast numbers of prison officers in every establishment and can make the best use of the staff that is available.

Mr. Hurd: We have to make the best use of the staff that is available, but I think that my hon. Friend will acknowledge that contact between staff and inmates is an important part of running a successful prison. Lack of contact between staff and inmates is not a sensible way of averting suicides, for example. But I agree with my hon. Friend's general point. The sooner we pull down in some cases, but in more cases improve, the old prisons, the better we shall be pleased. My hon. Friend is setting a very good example by encouraging me to find a place for a prison in his constituency. I hope that other hon. Members, as they see the advantages of having a modern prison, with the prosperity that surrounds it, as I saw at Full Sutton, will follow my hon. Friend's useful example.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Will my right hon. Friend accept that one important aspect of the morale of prison officers is that they should be allowed the same right to buy their homes as other people have? In my constituency there has been inordinate delay in allowing prison officers to exercise their right to buy their quarters. Will my right hon. Friend look into the matter personally to ensure that prison officers' rights are maintained?

Mr. Hurd: I shall look into the position. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary may be able to say something about that matter when he replies to the debate.

One of the main purposes of Fresh Start is to provide a firm basis for the regime of the prisoner. The greater flexibility provided by group working under Fresh Start, coupled with clear definition and distribution of activities, offers more certainty. For example, once Fresh Start systems are working effectively, there should be far fewer occasions when work in the workshops or classes is disrupted because there is a trial on and prison officers have to do escort duty.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): My right hon. Friend may be interested to know that I was in Stafford prison only three days ago and I had consultations about Fresh Start. He may be glad to hear that it has gone down extremely well there, despite the fact that it is an old prison. Although the abattoir site needs to be refurbished, we will be glad to have an improvement in Stafford over the next few years.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is always encouraging to receive confirmation of the advice that I get from my own advisers.

I am beginning—and I do not put it higher than that—to hear about examples from across the country of how time spent on education in the prison service has increased by 6 per cent. during the day and by 7 per cent. in the evening. There has been evening association for prisoners at Manchester for the first time in years. More time is being spent on visits at Leeds. To confirm what my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) said, industrial workshop time at Stafford is up by at least 20 per cent. However, there are many places where the improvement in regimes has not yet occurred. Because the news in the media is almost always gloomy on this point, I have picked out the cases where Fresh Start is beginning to produce one of its main objectives, which is an improvement in the regime as a prison is better run.

As every hon. Member who speaks in the debate will probably illustrate, the prison service faces demands on an unprecedented scale. Although we have arguments with the Prison Officers Association, I pay tribute to the way in which the staff of the service are, on the whole, responding to the challenge. The Government have a commitment, and we have asked Parliament for a commitment to the service, partly in terms of money and partly in terms of fresh thinking and of clear and sustained decisions.

As I said, since 1979 we have increased expenditure on the prison service by 43 per cent. in real terms. The size of the continuing problem is there for all to see. Although the total crime figures are less daunting than they were, the offences for which a prison sentence is normal are still rising. When the House last debated prisons in 1986 we looked back on several days of disastrous riot and destruction. Today we are looking forward to our programme extricating a crucial public service from great difficulty and putting it on a firm road. That is some progress. So far as it is in my power, I intend to sustain that progress.

5.2 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): The Opposition welcome the debate. I congratulate the Home Secretary not only on initiating it but on the tone, if not always the content, of his speech. For some reason which I have never been able to understand, the Home Secretary does not always welcome my political embrace, so I shall say no more in congratulation to him than that I look forward to watching him on television making a speech in similar tone to the Conservative party conference in October.

As the Home Secretary will gladly confirm, the crisis in our prisons did not begin last year or the year before. In every year of this decade in its annual report, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Prisons has warned the Government, in the strongest terms, about overcrowding and the consequences of overcrowding. In 1981 the report described it as "a major problem in its own right and the direct cause of many of the suffocating difficulties which beset the system".

In 1982 it

"loomed as large if not larger than the year before".

In 1984 it "remained a major problem".

In 1985, in perhaps the most damning criticism of all, the inspectors said that there was "little new to say about it except that it had worsened considerably".

By 1986, according to the inspectors,

"breaking point was reached in many prisons".

Mr. Devlin: The overcrowding has been caused because the Administration of which the hon. Gentleman was a member cancelled the prison building programme.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. May I remind the House that this is a short debate which must finish at 7 o'clock. Interventions are made only at the expense of the speeches of other hon. Members.

Mr. Hattersley: I shall heed your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I suggest to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) that, if he is called later, he should try to rise to the Home Secretary's level and say something constructive rather than make petty political points.

During the last decade the prison population has risen by almost 20 per cent. This contradicts the point that the hon. Gentleman has just made. It has been during the last decade that the prison population has risen by 20 per cent. and that has caused the emergency. The prison population was 42,000 in 1979, 46,000 in 1985, 48,000 in 1987 and 50,000 in March of this year. In response to that the Government have initiated a major programme of prison building. From time to time they have taken emergency action, ranging from early release to the use of army camps.

A substantial building programme is necessary. The Government deserve to be congratulated on bringing forward the programme, which, with one major reservation, should be welcomed, and I welcome it. My one reservation—here I come to the error made by the hon. Member for Stockton, South—is that the building programme alone will not solve the problem. We must not be trapped into the illusion of believing that.

The problem of prison overcrowding in some areas over the last year may have been exacerbated by the dispute between the prison officers and the Home Office. Lord Ferrers, speaking in another place, was explicit about a more fundamental cause which I know the Home Secretary wishes to address and which I, too, will attempt to address. Explaining the reason why remand prisoners were in police cells, Lord Ferrers described the prison service as being temporarily overwhelmed by the high level of population growth. That was part of the reason—a part that the Government can hardly claim took them by surprise.

Equally important were two other factors: first, the unremitting increase in crime during the past decade; and, secondly, the fact that in Great Britain we send too many people to prison, we keep too many of them in prison for too long, and we imprison them in conditions which make it likely that they will return to a life of crime. The Home Secretary did not altogether convince me that he is ready to tackle head on the fundamental problem of too many people going to prison, not least because of his interestingly selective use of international comparisons.

I want to give the Home Secretary the figures at which he half hinted, but which he did not spell out. In the United Kingdom we have 96 prisoners for every 100,000 members of the population. In France the figure is 89, and falling. In West Germany it is 84, and falling. In Belgium it is 69, in Denmark 69, in Spain 67, in Italy 57, in Sweden 57 and in Holland 37. In the United States and Canada the figures are higher, but included in their figures are men and women in institutions which in this country would probably not be classified as prisons.

I shall deal later with those institutions, which are for drug offenders—not traffickers, but users—for alcoholics and for the incapable or the simple misfits in society. If we had such institutions, our society would be a great deal better and our prison system more effective. However, the United Kingdom sends more people to prison than any other country in western Europe.

Mr. Hurd: As a proportion of the population.

Mr. Hattersley: Yes, indeed, but I do not believe that there is anything inherent in the British character which makes a custodial sentence peculiarly appropriate to the British criminal. However, on historical evidence, there is something about the prejudices of the British Establishment—no matter which political party they may come from—that makes the Establishment believe that long prison sentences are the way to reduce crime. On all the evidence available, the opposite is true.

Mr. Hurd: On the statistical point, we were second and we are now fourth. Three other countries in the Council of Europe are now ahead of us on the proportionate comparison that the right hon. Gentleman is making. Our prison population has been increasing more slowly in recent years than what of four or five other countries, including France and Ireland.

Mr. Hattersley: If the figures that I possess are correct, the right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that there are two countries where the proportion is worse than ours. Without any reservations, I concede that Austria is one of those countries. I am informed that the other is Turkey.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): Another is Luxembourg.

Mr. Hattersley: I give the hon. Gentleman Luxembourg —[Interruption.] I congratulate him on mentioning Luxembourg. I am prepared to play the statistics game. I challenge his Luxembourg with my Federal Republic of Germany. When the examples quoted by Conservative Members are Austria, which I concede, Luxembourg, which I suppose is important, and Turkey, which I do not include in my definition of a democratic state of Western Europe, the case is overwhelmingly on my side.

What is equally incontrovertible is that the enthusiasm for custodial sentences has increased recently. In the late 1970s, 16 per cent. of adult males convicted of indictable offences were sent to prison. In 1986, the figure increased to 21 per cent. Together with the changes in regulations governing bail and parole—to which I shall turn in a moment—that has resulted in the most grotesque prison overcrowding. In January of this year, there were 18,406 prisoners sharing cells which were designed for single occupation. In fact, anyone who visits our old prisons knows that we are holding prisoners in conditions the Victorians would not have tolerated. There is no training, inadequate recreation, infrequent bathing and minimum visits. That does not deter crime—it breeds it. I accept that the Home Secretary can point to examples of prisons where conditions have improved, but the overall picture is appalling.

In the past, the Home Secretary has responded to calls for fewer and shorter custodial sentences with the reply that he supports stiff punishment for crimes of violence and burglary. So do we all. Building on what the Home Secretary has said, I include in that category an offence that requires strong action—drug trafficking. But prisoners convicted of those offences make up only a comparatively small part of the prison population—less than one in five of the number of men and women convicted in any one year. Of the 86,153 men and women given custodial sentences last year, only 16,371 were convicted of extremely serious offences. Our argument is that the petty offenders, the inadequates and the fine defaulters should be given non-custodial sentences or should serve considerably shorter periods in gaol. I shall make other proposals later in my speech about bail and remand, but our central concern is sentencing policy.

Some hon. Members will regard my argument as soft-hearted. They delude themselves if they believe that custodial sentences reduce petty crime, especially custodial sentences served in present conditions. The idea that a young man leaves prison chastened and repentant is all too often a romantic myth. Often, he leaves deeply embittered. Since visiting is now down in some prisons to half an hour a month, he often leaves prison with a need to rebuild a relationship with his family. We know that one of the causes of renewed criminality is the discharged prisoner's inability to re-establish a relationship with the family he left behind and to receive the necessary support from that family.

The way in which we presently organise our prisons —a man who has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment will see his wife, perhaps, for six hours during that period —makes it almost impossible for released prisoners to settle down to normal life and receive the support from their families that is necessary if they are to avoid criminality. I remind the House:

> "The worst effect of prison overcrowding and poor regimes is not that they make the prisoners more uncomfortable, but that they make them more likely to re-offend."

[Mr. Hattersley]

Those are not my words, but the words of the Home Secretary; and they are true. The only way in which we can avoid a regime which encourages and increases criminality —the regime that the Home Secreatry so accurately described—rather than reduces it is to cut the prison population.

Yet, year by year, prison conditions continue to deteriorate because of overcrowding. I have read—it made unpleasant reading—the Bow board of visitors most recent report on Wandsworth prison, in which it describes conditions of almost unbelievable squalor. The degradation involved in imprisonment there must breed crime. It must have an intolerable effect on the prison officers who work in that prison. Having read that report last night, it did not surprise me to learn at lunchtime today that there was a dispute in that prison this morning. How the prison officers can tolerate it and the prisoners survive is something which anyone who reads that report will find difficult to understand. That prison is not alone in being described in that way by its board of visitors.

The report of the Leicester visitors came to a simple conclusion. It stated:

"We regard it as increasingly irresponsible to rely on an annual miracle and luck to run a prison."

Yet the Government are not taking the radical steps needed to reduce overcrowding and—by parliamentary answer—have formally abandoned their commitment to a code of minimum standards in our prisons, even for eventual implementation.

A month ago I visited the probation service in west Yorkshire, where I saw the result of a scheme which it is running in Dewsbury and its success with young offenders with two or three convictions. On the evidence provided, young men given non-custodial sentences are less likely to commit a further offence than their contemporaries who were sent to prison for similar crimes. The non-custodial sentences imposed by the local courts were neither painless nor easily discharged. They almost invariably involved some sort of restitution to the community or to the individuals against whom the offences had been committed. The clear conclusion from the Dewsbury experience was that non-custodial sentences are not so much the soft option but the sensible option for society. No one wants what the Home Secretary weakly described as a licence to offend again. However, it is sensible from the community's point of view to see extensions of community service orders, day centres and those systems which are cheaper than prison and have a better result for the community than prison now offers.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman disagree with the statement that the courts must also react to the perception of the need for higher penalties when necessary, because that was recently said by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris)? Are we seeing yet another split in the Labour party?

Mr. Hattersley: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was here, or whether he was sharpening his tiny political axe, when I explained that, for a variety of offences, severe punishment and therefore considerable sentences were necessary. The distinction that I am trying to draw is between those sentences which are appropriately long and those which are unnecessarily long. I remind the hon. Gentleman that normally, when such matters are discussed, it is the Home Secretary's habit to insist that the length of sentence is a matter not for him but for the court. Indeed, he has said that today. That is at least disingenuous.

First, it is up to the Home Secretary, as he conceded today in part of his speech, to make available suitable alternatives, such as supervised release. Until there is a universal pattern of available alternatives, the Home Secretary must take some responsibility for the custodial sentences that the courts impose.

Secondly, it is possible for the Government to advise the judiciary, through the Lord Chancellor, of their views on the efficiency, efficacy and necessity of long sentences.

Thirdly, and most importantly, the Home Secretary is responsible for creating the sentencing climate. Nobody wants him to direct the judiciary, because that would be quite intolerable. However, he does have an influence over its actions, although it may be oblique and indirect.

The Home Secretary and his immediate predecessors have created a climate in which the judges—who, whatever they may pretend, are only human—have come to believe that long custodial sentences are what society expects of them. That climate has been not simply created by the public statements of successive Home Secretaries but propagated by some of their actions. It is indisputable that decisions made by the Home Secretary's predecessors have directly contributed to the number of men and women who are now held in British prisons.

In 1981 Lord Whitelaw came to the House with a proposal for supervised early release, not as an emergency but as part of the process of custodial sentences. We welcomed and supported the proposal that prisoners serving sentences for the least serious offences would be discharged under supervision before the full sentence was completed. Unfortunately, the Conservative party conference did not and, as a result, the proposal was abandoned. Now, seven years later, I understand that the Parole Review Committee, under the chairmanship of Lord Carlisle—a committee that I thought would have rated a mention during the Home Secretary's speech but did not—may recommend a scheme identical to that which the then Home Secretary brought to the House seven years ago.

Supervised release for prisoners serving two years or less, on the Whitelaw pattern, would cut the prison population by 6,000. Were it applied to prisoners serving three-year sentences or less, the prison population would be reduced by about 8,000. I can only hope that the Home Secretary has more success with the Conservative party conference than was enjoyed by his distinguished predecessor seven years ago.

I hope that the Home Secretary will face the real issues with greater determination than was shown by his immediate predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). The right hon. and learned Gentleman changed the rules governing parole. Those changes have produced an increase of about 2,000 in the prison population. That increase is indisputably and directly the Government's responsibility.

The Home Secretary is more guilty of sins of omission than commission. His failure is that he has not dealt with another major cause of prison overcrowding—the increase in the numbers of remand prisoners, who, according to his figures this afternoon, make up 11,000 out of, say, a prison population of 50,000.

I do not want to weary the House with the principles involved in the matter except to say that in a free society remand prisoners, who are by definition innocent until a trial proves otherwise, should be brought to that trial as speedily as possible. I simply draw attention to the practical implications of extended remand. I want to ask the Home Secretary a simple question that I hope the Under-Secretary of State will answer when he replies to the debate. It is now almost five years since the Government obtained the power to require men and women held on remand to be brought to trial within a specified time. That rule has been applied with conspicuous success for many years in Scotland. The Home Secretary now applies the principle timidly, area by area, in England and Wales. Why does he not make it a general rule and, as a result, substantially reduce the prison population?

I know that the Home Secretary is concerned about the workings of the prosecution system. However, the difficulties that might arise from the rule being applied universally would not be cumulative. To put it simply, by applying the rule across all London the problems, real or imaginary, that have been created by its application in parts of London would not increase. His timidity results in unnecessary and unacceptable pressure on the whole system.

It is unacceptable for reasons of principle as well as practice. Of the prisoners remanded in custody, 38 per cent. of the men and 62 per cent. of the women who are refused bail are later acquitted or given non-custodial sentences. Clearly a larger proportion of those remand prisoners should be held on bail.

Yesterday the Minister of State sent out information which was described as being "designed to assist the courts in bail decisions."

The Home Secretary referred to that in passing, if at all. It refers to the "need for consistency of approach."

I hope that I am not doing the courts an injustice when I say that by referring to the "need for consistency of approach,"

the Minister was treating them gently. At the moment, their approach is wildly inconsistent. If the courts do not respond to the Government's gentle prodding, I hope that the Home Secretary will consider a fundamental review of the Bail Act 1976 and laying down laws and regulations that require the courts to operate consistently rather than capriciously, as is the case now.

Currently, prisoners awaiting trial or sentence represent over 20 per cent. of the prison population. As a matter of practice, they are applying an intolerable and unnecessary burden on the prison service. The problem of principle is intensified by the fact that, according to the latest figures, 1,000 remand prisoners are now being held in police cells. That is bad in every way. It is bad for the prisoners who are held in intolerable conditions, for the police who are put under additional pressure and for the system of justice because it makes access of lawyers and solicitors sometimes difficult to the point of near impossibility. Again, the problem will be solved only by radical determination to reduce the prison population.

I may be doing the Home Secretary a slight injustice when I say that his faults are those of timidity alone. He is also guilty of hopeless confusion in his attitude towards remand. He claims that we should reduce the period in which men and women are held before trial, but in the Criminal Justice Bill he proposed to change the remand rules so that the initial application can cover 28 rather than seven days. I know that has the marginal benefit of reducing the time taken by prison officers and police in travelling between court and prison, but the penalties are enormous. One of them is the increase in the number of remand prisoners held at any one time. I hope that the Home Secretary will not underestimate the significance of that increase. We know that the increase in remand prisoners has increased the prison population over the past year by 700. The Home Secretary admitted that on 30 March when, for the second time in a year, he came to the House to announce emergency action. That is exactly the number of new places he has found it necessary to create in the Army camps at Rollestone and Camberley. Had he not allowed the number of remand prisoners to increase, those Army camps would not have been needed.

I repeat that I do not suggest that the Government's recent shortcomings are the main cause of the prison population explosion. The real causes are more longstanding. They are based on enthusiasm for sending men and women to gaol. That enthusiasm varies from area to area and results in some magistrates sending 9 per cent. of convicted offenders to prison while in other areas the figure is as high as 35 per cent. Section 1(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1982 provided the first steps towards laying down criteria by which the courts could judge the suitability of custody for offenders under 21. We believe that the time has come for similar criteria to be laid down for all offenders, as a matter not only of civil liberties but of practical necessity. The answer lies in radical measures.

The remedy lies also in the introduction of an early release scheme for minor offenders, in the creation of a climate in which prison is used as a last resort and sentences are of a sensible length and in the removal from the prison system altogether of some of the thousands of people who should never have been there in the first place —obvious examples being fine defaulters and debtors. Fine defaulters constitute only 1·5 per cent. of the average daily prison population but they account for one fifth of all offenders entering prison. They therefore impose a huge and disproportionate burden on the prison system.

It is still not clear whether the Government support or reject the idea of day fines related directly to offenders' ability to pay rather than some notional tariff that the courts carry in their collective heads. Perhaps the Under-Secretary will tell us the Government's conclusion on that subject. We certainly support that idea and I hope that the Government will share our enthusiasm for it.

The Government have not been sufficiently imaginative in considering ways in which maintenance payments can be collected rather than written off by the acceptance of a prison sentence. There can be nothing more desperate in our society than the circumstances of the family that does not receive the maintenance that pays its grocery bills because a man believes that he has discharged his duty by serving a prison sentence.

There is another category of prisoner that clogs up the system without providing any benefit either to society or to the individual on whom the sentence has been imposed. There are in our prisons today a large number of men and women who are simply social inadequates—drunkards, vagrants and small fine defaulters who have been convicted of offences related to their inadequacies. They are constantly returned to prison for short sentences, and they impose an enormous cost and burden on the system. In other countries, they are dealt with quite differently.

[Mr. Hattersley]

The non-custodial institutions in which they spend their time are far less expensive than full-blown prisons. It is in the creation of such institutions that the Home Secretary should see the solution for some of the overcrowding that he has described.

The problem will not be solved by the prison building programme alone or by the occasional opening of Army camps or agreement to emergency accelerated release. It will certainly not be solved by the introduction of unacceptable and unworkable gimmicks, such as electronic tagging, about which I note the Home Secretary had nothing whatever to say today. I hope that we can assume that as the electronic tagging idea served no more serious a purpose than to get the name of the Minister of State into the newspapers from time to time, we can abandon all discussion on it and write it off. The Home Secretary shakes his head. Does he intend to go forward with such a scheme or does he not?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman must contain his curiosity until he sees our Green Paper on punishment in the community. As I have often said, we are considering whether some scheme of electronic tagging would fit into British conditions and help to provide the alternatives to custody of which I spoke at some length.

Mr. Hattersley: Part of my admiration for the Home Secretary is that he describes electronic tagging with such obvious patrician disdain. If he took it as seriously as the Minister of State, he would no doubt have dealt with it in some detail today. But it seems to be the only subject on which the Minister of State ever makes a speech. Recourse to and refuge in such gimmicks will not solve the problems; nor will the building programme, welcome though it is. The real solution lies in sending fewer people to prison, in excluding from prison those for whom a custodial sentence is inappropriate and in ensuring that when such a sentence is necessary it is no longer than meets the bill and fits the crime. We shall continue to advocate that course and we shall continue to hope that the Home Secretary has the nerve eventually to adopt such an approach.

5.34 pm

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) properly and understandably ranged across the whole spectrum of prison affairs. I propose to draw attention to an aspect of prison life which may at first sight seem marginal, but which, in my view, is highly significant. I refer to the role of prison chaplains and the place of religion and worship in prisons. I do so not wearing an official Church of England hat but merely as a trustee of a charity—Prison Fellowship—which is actively concerned with these matters.

The Homc Secretary will know that there are 87 full-time and 40 part-time Anglican prison chaplains in post at present. There are a dozen full-time Roman Catholic chaplains and a number of part-time nonconformist chaplains.

Anyone with any experience of institutional life—whether at school or university, in the forces or in hospital work—will know two things. First, a chaplain is usually provided, but usually in rather a formal and automatic way. Rather like a medical officer, he is someone who one needs to have about the place but to whom one hopes and believes people will not need to have recourse. Secondly, when the right man is in post as chaplain, the effect for good can be the most fundamental and pervasive of all factors affecting the morale of the institution. That is certainly true in prisons, and it goes further than that. Most prisoners have not darkened the doors of a parish church or chapel since the earliest days when they had a brush with the baptismal font in their local place of worship. Once they are in prison, probably only two factors or influences can give them a fresh start, and it is a fresh start for prisoners with which we must be concerned above all.

Education is an enormously important and valuable influence. The experience of a poorly educated prisoner who progresses to become a candidate or graduate of the Open university is profoundly rehabilitative. The other influence is the experience of an inner change of heart in which the inmate comes to terms with his guilt, his sense of personal value is restored and he finally achieves a sense of social acceptance, whereas his relationship with society has been profoundly disrupted. This latter rehabilitative influence can come only through the work of religion, the prison chaplaincy service and, above all, through contact with the churches in the vicinity of the prison where the prisoner is held.

In pursuit of positive rehabilitative prison objectives, it behoves the prison service and the Government to give as much help, support and encouragement as possible to the prison chaplain and his role. At present, that support is not always forthcoming in practical terms. For example, chaplaincy meetings and programmes tend to be early victims of any constraints imposed by staff shortages on the daily or weekly routine of prisons. Chaplaincy meetings are often forced to start late and finish early and they are often cancelled. Midweek programmes, particularly, seem to be extremely vulnerable to cancellation and disruption. Sometimes blocks A and B of a prison are given access to a chaplaincy meeting while blocks C and D are disbarred from it for some reason.

The most notorious example of unhelpful attitudes to the work of the prison chaplaincy is the history of the famous Dartmoor evening service, which has taken place from time immemorial. It involved the local Salvation Army band coming into the prison. It was a marvellous evening service, supported by local churches and chapels. The Dartmoor evening service has been stopped and there appears to be no prospect of its being allowed to resume, simply because of the undervaluation of the significance and role that such services may have. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, if he can do nothing else for the chaplaincy service, can guarantee that the Dartmoor evening service, which is of tremendous local fame, is reinstated. If he offers us that, he will earn the support and affection in particular of my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson), who takes an enormous interest in Dartmoor prison.

Another matter of concern, especially when set against the background of the statutory right of prisoners to worship—it is written into the prison rules—is the difficulty faced by a number of special category prisoners in getting access to places of worship. Secure unit inmates, rule 43 inmates—prisoners who are segregated because they have committed sexual offences—and prisoners subject to punishment are often prevented from enjoying their statutory right to take part in acts of worship. If there is only a part-time chaplain, it is difficult to work services for such prisoners into the overcrowded chaplaincy programme. Hardship is involved, especially for Roman Catholic prisoners who have a strong sacramental dimension to their religious faith and to whom holy communion is vital. It is especially difficult for part-time Roman Catholic chaplains to go round to all prisoners if those prisoners are not allowed to come to meetings.

I am told that part of the explanation for the difficulty in moving such prisoners is the "Gartree helicopter" factor —the deep sensitivity of the prison service about security. Surely the remedy is a greater willingness to trust prison chaplains and to dispense with prison officer supervision at every sort of chaplaincy function or meeting. It should be possible to do that, with a little confidence from the prison governor. In the old days, the prison governor was the first key holder, but the prison chaplain was the second. Those days have gone, but more trust and confidence should be placed in prison chaplains conducting their meetings without the necessity for supervision.

Another matter of concern is the tendency in many prisons to undermine the regular slot—which should be enjoyed, because it is a statutory right—for Sunday morning worship, by providing for other activities at that time, for example, family visits and sporting events. Quite apart from the statutory basis of Sunday worship, and the merit in protecting it from competing events, it is profoundly unfair on prisoners to deny them this right. They spend much of their time in their cells by themselves without moving around the prison. Prisoners must make an agonising choice between competing events to which they would like to go, and then have to return from one to an extended time in the cell, having missed the others. I hope that the regular service of worship is protected and that this slot is made unique for the prisoner who wants to attend worship.

In the current revision of prison standing orders, which are of great significance and could have enormous implications for the prison chaplaincy service, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will ensure that some of the difficulties faced by chaplains are included in any scrutiny of how prison rules should apply and that some of the anxieties to which I have referred are attended to.

I conclude where I began: the chaplain can be a unique asset in the prison. Internally, a good prison chaplain is detached, yet he can be the confidant of every person in the prison, from the governor to the lowest level of prison officer, from the longest-serving prisoner to the most recently arrived. If the chaplain is trustworthy and good at his job, he is uniquely placed in the prison to develop confidence and to help everyone in all their various difficulties.

Externally, the prison chaplain can lower the drawbridge to the community outside. Few organisations are prepared in a community sense actively to identify themselves with prisoners, apart from the Christian Churches and fellowships. The prison chaplain can draw in such groups, who are only too willing to come into the prison and to mix freely, on equal terms and with complete reconciliation, with the prison population. If the prison chaplain is not allowed to lower that drawbridge, immense deprivation is forced upon the prisoners.

I remember vividly from my days as a junior health Minister that hospital doctors said that the key factor in progressive patient care, in getting people well in hospital, was to introduce into the hospital as many as possible of the healthy community from outside—healthy friends, associates and members of the family—so that patients felt that they belonged to the healthy community outside, and not to the sick community in the hospital. The same principle applies in prisons, but generally the only parts of the community that will go into prisons voluntarily are the Christian Churches. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should do everything possible through the chaplaincy service to encourage the mixing of the outside community with prisoners. For those reasons, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Home Office can give some encouragement and support to the prison chaplaincy service.

5.47 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Home Secretary has held his office for three and a half years and, therefore, it is possible to review his achievements and attitude to the problems in the prisons with objectivity and certainty that might not have been possible even a year ago.

Many people who are concerned about prisons—the Home Secretary said that there were not many in the House, but he underestimates the interest—would have felt when he took office that there had been individual crises in the prison service which had ruffled the otherwise relatively smooth waters of the previous 20 years. In the 1960s, there was the Blake escape and problems of prison security. There was a crisis in the early 1980s, following the industrial action of the prison officers, which was evidence of the staff being under pressure. In the mid-1980s, there was a particularly steep incline in the prison population. We now face not sporadic crises but an endemic problem in the prison service which shows no sign of amelioration and which, if the Home Secretary is unable or unwilling to go further, will deteriorate to a dangerous flashpoint.

In Scotland, where an even higher proportion of the population is incarcerated than in England, the conditions in Peterhead and Perth appear to have led to outbreaks of violence which are the subject of actions in court and which have been commented upon in official and unofficial inquiries. I regret that, because this is such a short debate and no Scottish Minister is participating, it is not possible to review the Scottish scene at length, but the position is alarming. The widespread view in Scotland is that nothing less than a Royal Commission into the penal system will ensure that penal matters are dealt with seriously and that the issues that appear to be being handled by placebos and platitudes by the Scottish Office will be given proper consideration.

The Home Secretary's speech typically showed no radical commitment to dealing with the problem. It is difficult for him, because he operates with colleagues and in a political party whose atavistic, punitive response to crime makes it exceedingly difficult for Conservative Ministers to take liberal measures when they may be necessary. It was typical of the right hon. Gentleman that he felt it worthwhile to argue about the proportion of convicted offenders confined in comparable European countries. It is of no great significance whether Britain is third, fourth or first, but it is undoubtedly true that a rising proportion of our population is being incarcerated. The figure now stands at about 96 prisoners per 100,000 of the population. There is little evidence that that rise in incarceration is contributing to the prevention of crime. The figures for recidivism—those who reoffend on release—are deeply depressing, nowhere more so than in respect of young offenders, two thirds of whom are reconvicted within two years of release.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): It is impertinent of me to intervene after having walked in so recently, and I apologise for that, but is the hon. Gentleman aware that there are three experiments using voluntary organisations in which the number of young people being incarcerated and reconvicted has fallen dramatically? Is not that an encouraging sign?

Mr. Maclennan: I find little of encouragement in the figures on young offenders; nor, I think, does the Home Secretary, for he has talked about the problem to the Magistrates Association in south-east London.

There is no evidence that prison makes an effective contribution to the reduction of crime. Most non-violent crime is committed by young offenders, so it is especially important to tackle the problem. The absence of any academic evidence supporting the efficacy of imprisonment might at least lead a cost-conscious Government to consider the efficacy of alternatives. It must be admitted that there is not much foolproof evidence either way, but at least the alternatives to prison are very much more inexpensive and almost certainly no less effective.

The difficulty appears to be that the Home Secretary has approached all the alternatives tentatively and hesitantly and by a process of extensive trial, without the wholehearted commitment necessary to tackle the problem. The rate of increase of prison places to which he referred when speaking about his building programme will not take care of the increased number of prisoners if the alternatives are not tried.

The Home Secretary frequently pays lip service to the need to satisfy public opinion about the appropriateness of the sentencing policy, but too often it is not recognised that public opinion is less atavistic and punitive than is sometimes claimed in Conservative party conferences. Such evidence as there is about public opinion—polling evidence, and evidence from the 1984 crime survey, from the Prison Reform Trust study of 1982, and even from the Mail on Sunday in 1985—shows that if there is a choice between spending more money on building prisons or reducing the prison population by giving non-prison sentences for minor crimes, the public prefers by a clear majority the non-custodial approach. If the Home Secretary wants to influence public opinion so that people understand the problems that he faces, he will do well to commission further research on the effectiveness of alternative forms of penal treatment. Lord Butler, a distinguished predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman, clearly envisaged, when setting up the research unit in the Home Office in 1957, that this sort of information would be made available. Regrettably, the resources have not been sufficient to do that.

The Home Secretary has taken an important step in Fresh Start towards improving the rehabilitative and reforming impact of prisons. In introducing the programme, which everyone supports, he has, however, compounded staff shortages and resource problems. In some cases accommodation cannot be used because of such shortages. One example is the Castington youth custody centre in Northumbria, where 60 cells equipped with sanitation are empty because there is no one to staff them. In Acklington, 213 cells were vacated when the new wings were brought into use, and there is no sign of whether they will be brought back into use to deal with the present crisis. The problems are replicated around the country.

The Home Secretary referred to his experiment with alternative means of handling the problems of court escort duty, which has deprived the prison service of the possibility of developing education and work alternatives in a number of prisons. Once again, no firm action is being taken and we are promised nothing that can tackle the problem.

There can be no doubt, in the light of the Wandsworth prison visitors' report and the annual inspectors' reports, that the present internal prison regimes—in particular, the overcrowded local prisons and police cells holding prisoners on remand—are degrading for prisoners, demoralising for the staff and wholly unacceptable in a civilised society.

The Home Secretary talked about what he could do to alter the climate on sentencing. He can and must do a great deal more by way of exhortation. Exhortation, even by the Court of Appeal, appears to be inadequate. The Bibi case—the leading case—in 1980 advised sentencers to consider whether sentences half the length of that which came to their minds would be appropriate. Such exhortations seem to have no effect, whether they come from the Court of Appeal, the Lord Chief Justice or the Home Secretary. That in itself must give rise to the question whether Parliament should intervene.

I wholly accept the Home Secretary's view that it is inappropriate for him to intervene in particular cases, although it is not unknown for Home Secretaries to intervene in categories of cases where a pattern of sentences appears to create injustices. As long ago as April 1888, Sir William Harcourt, reflecting on his experience as a Liberal Home Secretary, said that he had considered the need to ensure that young people of eight and under were not detained in prison cells, not because there were no prison cells in which to detain them but because it was a great injustice to detain such young people. The time may have come for the Home Secretary equally to seek alternatives.

The Home Secretary recognised the value of bail hostels, but, again, their location is hopelessly inadequate and there are insufficient of them to provide alternatives for sentencers. The bail verification scheme, which also enjoys the Home Secretary's nominal support, is on a wholly inadequate scale. He said nothing about the desirability of legal representation at remand hearings as of right, which might result in fewer people being held.

Of the non-custodial options available to the court, community service orders and package-deal probation orders are obviously of great interest to the courts and they use them wherever they can. However, the non-availability of non-penal hostel accommodation, day centres and centres for the treatment of alcohol and drug addiction is particularly scandalous. One young offender in my constituency has been repeatedly committed to Inverness prison as a persistent glue sniffer because there is no other secure place in which he can be held, and he cannot be given treatment at Inverness. Britain's expenditure on prisons is massive, but our expenditure on alternatives to prison is wholly inadequate.

The sentencing discretion must not be directly interfered with, but sentencers are not always sufficiently informed about the practical consequences of the alternatives in their localities. The Government would do well to consider—I hope that the Carlisle committee is doing so—the possibility of continuity of contact between those who are sentencing and those who are administering the penal system. That is not the practice in Britain. On visiting prisons around the country, it is remarkable to learn how few sentencers visit prisons.

In France the juge de l'application des peines is appointed by order for three years and the appointment is renewable. He supervises the serving of sentences, custodial conditions, permission to work outside prison, the granting of semi-freedom and release on licence. That practice has worked well in France, and comparable prison practices operate in Austria and several other countries. It is clearly not right to involve members of the judiciary in administration, but it is right that they should know the consequences of their sentences.

I also commend to the Government the introduction of a sentencing guidelines commission on the Minnesota model. Although provoked by a problem of overcrowding comparable to Britain's, but on a smaller scale, it was introduced in a way that has brought about some similarity in sentencing policy in courts throughout that state.

The Government could also look at the recommendations of Justice, made as long ago as 1980 in an important report called "Breaking the Rules", on the decriminalising of unlawful action. More than half of criminal offences involve strict liability with no regard to the state of mind of the offender. That series of recommendations is meritorious and overdue for consideration.

There remains a serious mystery about the Government's attitude to day-fines. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will clear it up. In January the Home Secretary said that the Government were not yet ready to relate fines to the ability of the offender to pay. Why not? The failure to tackle the problem of fine defaulters has distorted the prison population and could be tackled if the Government moved in that sphere. I cannot think why the Government are so reluctant to move on day fines. They should also remove the option of imprisonment for certain petty offences and perhaps ask the criminal law revision committee to review that prospect as a matter of urgency.

Under article 3 of the European convention on human rights, prisoners are entitled to be protected from degrading treatment and punishment, but the conditions in British prisons today are such that we may conceivably be regularly in breach of that right. The Government do not even appear to be planning to arrive at agreed codified standards and, in their abandonment of the recommendation that prison standards be codified, they have taken a step back.

Prisoners' grievances can and should be tackled in two ways. First, in matters of discretion, a prison ombudsman is appropriate. In matters of rules which convey rights, prisoners should enjoy legal assistance in the preparation of their case. They should also have more ready access to a legal remedy than at present.

The incoherence and vapidity of the criminal justice policy being pursued by the Government is one of the most serious social blots on our current society. I believe that the Home Secretary recognises that. What he plainly does not recognise, and what it is the duty of the House to bring home, is that it is within his power to take action urgently to reduce the prison population. That is the only solution to the problems that we face.

6.10 pm

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): First, let me pay a tribute to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and his ministerial colleagues. We tend to think that all the problems, disasters and miseries associated with the disgraceful dustbins of prisons in this country have been created in the last few years. But the position has been deteriorating for 30 or 40 years—perhaps even longer. We now treat inmates in all such establishments far worse than did the Victorians, who built their prisons to accommodate one person per cell.

I do not want to go too much into the miseries, the degradation and all that goes with such conditions. My prime interest is not in the taxpayer spending hundreds of millions of pounds on the development of new prisons without the removal of old ones. I want to see an enthusiastic, encouraging and much larger programme for organisations with which I have had the privilege of working ever since they were started—the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, Stonham housing association, the National Association of Probation Officers, and others throughout the country. Those organisations are constantly using their best endeavours to take people out of the prison system. But, sadly, they have been starved of funds. At present, 1,200 people are lodged in police cells or cells in magistrates courts, at a cost of well over £1,000 a week per person. That is more than it costs to stay at the Ritz or Claridges. I am not suggesting that we take over the Ritz—although it would be less expensive, and the rooms are a much better size, with their own loos, bathrooms and telly.

Yet we allow the present position to continue. We have to tell Stonham housing association and NACRO that they must live through a long-winded, badly thought out, miserably excused and disguised moratorium while we examine our position. Early this year the moratorium imposed by the Home Office was lifted, and we were told that this would be of great help to the problem of overcrowding. There would be 450 extra beds, spread over three years. I do not think that that is very good, taken in the context of over 1,200 people being held in police and magistrates' courts cells.

Owing to the length of some of the speeches, we shall miss the opportunity of hearing some hon. Members on both sides of the House. That is a pity, in a short debate, but both sides show little sign of enthusiasm or interest in this important issue.

Last year, because of the frustrations and pent-up emotions in the prisons, over £14 million was spent on putting right damage caused by riots and disruptions. That can be easily understood. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and his colleagues will be urged by the House to pay far more attention not necessarily to building prisons without getting rid of the old ones, but to establishing units outside. For instance, a place in a probation hostel costs about £155 a week. A place in a Stonham hostel costs about £90 a week, and a probation order costs very much less. Surely it makes sense to develop and use the alternatives that are already available. There is no suggestion that we have no alternatives.

I agree with much that has been said about the need to change some of the methods of taking care of offenders. Look at what we do to offenders in this place! If anyone offends here, he is duly judged, and we give him 10 days' holiday with full pay and all allowances. There are different approaches, but I think that the humanitarian approach, the sensible approach, the economical approach is through the voluntary housing system, which has all the apparatus ready.

When I see people such as fine defaulters—19,000 of them—remanded in custody and then released, it appals me. I was involved in 1947 with the original Discharged Prisoner Aid Society, and since then I have been involved with NACRO and Stonham. We cannot seem to see the wood for the trees. I do not know where the blockage is. However, I feel certain that unless my right hon. Friend and his colleagues, along with other hon. Members, take some positive action to relieve the immense pressure on the prison system, we shall pay dearly for it.

I accept what my right hon. Friend says about magistrates and judges. After all, I frequently accept what is said by my hon. Friends on the Conservative Benches. We should not interfere with the judiciary, but there are ways of dealing with these matters. I suppose that the ultimate sanction that the Lord Chancellor has is early retirement for a few of them. That may be a good thing. Indeed, it might be a good idea to have a retiring age in the House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No.

Mr. Irving: My hon. Friend has a long way to go, so he need not worry.

Nothing is too trivial to examine. We are in the most perilous national crisis for a very long time. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has been in office for three and a half years. It is probably the worst job in the Government—most former Home Secretaries tell me so. I have been associated with the Refreshment Department for nine years, which is almost as bad. There is no release there.

The debate has produced a mass of statistics on how much we will spend over the next 10 years putting more and more people into prison. But we should be concentrating on a remedy that is within the bounds of public safety and public order. Few of us here are stupid enough not to realise that there are people who deserve and will have to go to prison and be kept there for a long time. Nevertheless, statistics reveal that an appalling number of people are remanded and ultimately released, either innocent or with no prison sentence.

I hope that the Home Office, the Home Secretary and everyone else will help to meet and resolve the major dilemma that is facing the community and the prisons. Such co-operation is necessary if we are to avert a national disaster in our prisons. I pay tribute to the prison officers, because the conditions in which they work are almost intolerable. Certainly there have been improvements, but when one is working in a pent-up, tense atmosphere, humanities go out of the window. Problems will come straight in through the window if the House, the Government and all concerned do not take some early action to resolve the difficulties.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): It is always a pleasure to listen to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), who speaks so much sense. One contrasts the brevity of his remarks with the unmitigated diatribe that we heard from the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), who clearly did not understand the subject. Sometimes such things need to be said. I intend to be as brief as the hon. Member for Cheltenham, who put his finger on it when he said that the question to be asked is, not how to house the prisoners we have, but whom we should imprison. I declare an interest in that respect.

Over the years we have seen the growth of what is called tariff sentences—for a certain type of crime the sentence will be a certain type. Unfortunately, we have begun to sentence the offence rather than the offender. That is an appalling mistake. Such a mistake happens frequently in the Crown courts. Colleagues of mine have told me how they have heard Crown court judges say, "Of course, the tariff for this is X number of years." There is no question whether, in the particular circumstances of a particular defendent, there is an alternative way of dealing with him.

If we continue such sentencing practice, more and more people will be sent to prison because more and more people are committing crimes. Nobody has ever bothered to find out why. I understand from The Independent of a few days ago that the Minister has put together a team of 11 Ministers to inquire into that. What do 11 politicians know about it? Criminologists, psychologists, sociologists and various other persons have spent their lives studying that subject. Apparently no one bothers to ask them but rather asks Ministers. Perhaps it is amusing to note that on page two of that newspaper are reported the views of the British Medical Association about the order or priority for saving people after a nuclear war. I noticed that politicians came at the bottom of the list. It is possible that, in respect of prisons, the BMA has got it right. If we are to think about crime and punishment and how to solve our appalling prison crisis, we must ask the experts. We must ask what makes people commit a crime and how to deal with them when they do.

There has not been a Royal Commission on this subject since 1979—the year in which the Prime Minister came to office, which sheds some interesting light on the matter —and I accept that such commissions take time. The subject is important enough, however, to let the experts have their say. We should see if we can begin to undo the damage that has been done.

I accept that that damage has not occurred only in the past 10 years. When the Labour party was in government it made exactly the same mistakes as the present Government did in their early years of office. I do not blame either party, and I do not want to be political in this respect. We have all failed to anticipate the crisis and to put resources into the system early enough. For once let us accept the responsibility. Let us be big enough to say "Stop, we have got it wrong." Let us see if we can get it right.

I congratulate the Home Secretary on the prison building programme. The tragedy is that unless we change the sentencing policy we shall never catch up on the number of prisoners who are made available to the system. That is not the fault of the Government, the Home Office, the prison department or the courts because the sentencing pattern was established some 150 years ago when we gave up transportation. That is when the mistakes began. We began with the principle that imprisonment was the only alternative.

I remember being in a juvenile court when a 15-year-old boy appeared on his first charge of burglary. He was the lookout who was drafted in at the last moment. The stipendiary magistrate sat there in all his severity with his two lay colleagues. Before the magistrate had heard the mitigation or any explanation from the defence, he said, "Well, I think we will have reports on this. Obviously I am considering custody." That was the primary consideration on that first offence. That was lunacy. It is the sort of lunacy that has developed from a policy that gradually evolved as people said, "The crime rate is going up: what can we do about it?" We should have asked how we could deal with the offender in a way that would not make him reoffend. Instead of that it was considered best to lock them up and take them out of society. We have had the short, sharp, shock treatment which was then abandoned and the old borstals which were later abandoned.

Rather than examining the offender and the reasons for the offence, we have always said, "Let us see if we can deter." We have been naive and we have not approached the problem with an open mind. We, the lawyers, are as guilty as anyone and we, the politicians, are equally guilty.

The time has come for us to stand back and accept that we have failed all the way. We must accept the mess that we are now in. Let us see whether we are big enough to say that we shall simply ask the experts. We should see what they have to say and seek to solve the problem on that advice. Such advice will not come from politicians. We are imbued in our philosophical approaches and we have our prejudices. We are subject to the pressures of the postbag and often to the pressures of the press. We tend to give in and scream when we think that sentences are too short. We are not always objective. The criminologist, the sociologist, the psychiatrist—the expert—is objective.

I urge the Under-Secretary to consider a simple request. Let us see if we can break the record of the past nine years —I am not being political in this respect—and appoint a Royal Commission to ask two questions. First, who do we want to send to prison? Secondly, what is the purpose of imprisonment? If we find the answers to those questions, we shall certainly incarcerate the villainous and the evil who must go to prison, but we shall do it in a way that may rehabilitate them. We may just resolve the problem of reoffending.

It is interesting to consider the words of the prison officer at Chelmsford whom I met a few months ago. He said, "Gerry, I watch them come in for the first time like little lambs and I watch them go out after three months as professional villains." It is time we began to think seriously.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I wholeheartedly endorse the welcome given to my right hon. Friend's speech. It is extremely important to have a Home Secretary who does not regard the prison population as out of sight and out of mind. My right hon. Friend's openness in making the board of visitors' reports available, his frankness when discussing the problem and his proposals for the future are welcome to many of us.

I shall not dwell on the facts and figures—the 22 per cent. increase in staffing with the lower increase in the number of prisoners, the enormous plans for prison building and for further places. All of us are searching eagerly for ways of meeting the rising prison population.

When Fresh Start was introduced I expressed the hope in an Adjournment debate that the Prison Officers Association would work constructively with those proposals. I am still concerned that too many prison governors, who have responsible and onerous jobs, spend far too much of their time worrying about the shenanigans of the Prison Officers Association instead of worrying about the welfare and the needs of their more difficult prisoners. Too many members of the Prison Officers Association believe that a ballot at their local branch is as important as organising the prison. They refuse to work with women officers and lock out prisoners and refuse to accept more prisoners. Something like one third of those in police cells are there because of the obstructive and negative behaviour of some leaders of the Prison Officers Association.

I have been associated with this problem for many years. Unlike many hon. Members, I speak free from fear or favour, as there is no prison in my constituency. It is high time that the Prison Officers Association realised that it has to co-operate, and that the governors, not the unions, should manage the prisons.

Many people hope that my right hon. Friend will either move towards legislation to prevent the POA from taking strike action, in the same way as with the police and the Army, or to go further, in his privatisation or other proposals, to reduce the union's powers. The problem has been concealed for far too long and my right hon. Friend should realise that many people feel profoundly and strongly about it.

I recognise that the Fresh Start proposals have begun in many prisons, but difficulties still exist. Despite increased recruitment, the pressure of staff shortages clearly makes changes in working practices difficult, and I ask my right hon. Friend to continue to look favourably on the need for more staffing.

Many hon. Members have spoken about the desirability of non-custodial sentences. The majority of prisoners have not committed violent offences; many go to prison for failing to pay fines. Clearly it is essential that my right hon. Friend tries to extend to the adult sector many of the policies introduced in the juvenile sector.

There is much to be said for extending to adult sentences the criteria set in the Criminal Justice Act 1982 for custodial sentences for young offenders. I ask my right hon. Friend to do more and to draw the attention of justices' clerks and judges to the disparity in sentencing practices. He spoke effectively about the distinction between the independence of members of the judiciary and their isolation. There is much more to be done in highlighting, particularly to judges, the vast discrepancy in sentencing practice.

I must say again that I hope that my right hon. Friend will find a way to remove 14-year-olds from penal custody. It makes no sense for 500 youngsters to go into detention centres each year. They are not serious offenders. If they were, they would be covered by section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. The vast majority of them reoffend within two years. The child goes from following a delinquent career to becoming a career delinquent. Once young people have been inside a detention centre, they feel that that is where they belong and that they are hard men. Their chances of ending up in prison are increased.

Alternatives to custody were introduced in the juvenile sector by the development of local projects and local initiatives, often using the voluntary sector. It is interesting that those who object to the concept of privatisation fail to realise that the voluntary sector, while not providing services for profit, forms an alternative to the state providing all services. The other key lesson from the juvenile sector was that the local providers of the service —the police and the probation service—worked very well together to inspire the confidence of the courts, so that when sentencing a young person courts would not consider alternatives to custody a soft option.

My right hon. Friend's initiative in discussing punishment in the community provides real hope for the way forward. It is sometimes thought that the probation service is caring, helpful and advising and the prison service is custodial and punitive. That is an artificial distinction. It is high time that the probation service and the prison service realised that, although they are at different ends of a spectrum, they must both combine the skills of caring and controlling. That is why the immediate reaction to electronic tagging—which I was disappointed to hear from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley)—is ridiculous. If we can find a way of identifying where offenders are and thereby deterring crime, we should use it.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about the cause of crime. I cannot give him a definitive statement about the cause of crime, but I spent 10 years as a psychiatric social worker and 10 years as chairman of a juvenile court and I used to write papers on the subject. The vast majority of crime starts impulsively. It is circumstantial and involves youngsters who have few skills or advantages.

If electronic tagging can make a potential criminal, a remand prisoner or someone on a community probation service order feel supervised and watched over and, therefore, he does not commit a crime, surely it is the height of irresponsibility to rule it out of order. A remand prisoner at Chelmsford prison wrote in a recent letter to a newspaper:

> "When people talk about civil rights being infringed by the use of electronic tagging, what do they think about my civil rights in gaol whilst I await trial?"

The great delays in awaiting trial and the damage caused to family life are part of the same problem.

Broadly, I endorse the strategy that my right hon. Friend is pursuing. We have to maintain the confidence of the public and we have to ensure the co-operation of the judiciary. It has been said clearly and well that sending people to universities of crime is a costly alternative. It may be necessary for those who need to be kept out of circulation, but we must do all that we can to ensure that our prison system is effectively and efficiently managed, and to deter people from going to prison in the first place.

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and others who have spoken in the debate have illustrated clearly some of the basic facts about the present crisis in our prisons. Nationally, we have 50,500 prisoners in a system designed, sometimes by Victorian standards, for a prison population of about 42,000. Bedford prison has a capacity for 176 prisoners and holds 346 prisoners. Leeds prison has a capacity of 642 and holds 1,381 prisoners. Leicester prison, which my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) was hoping to mention but he had to leave the debate, has a capacity of 200 prisoners but contains 435 prisoners. It is clear that there is massive overcrowding and pressure in our prisons.

Many prisoners are being held in remand in police cells which are supposed to hold people for a few hours but are now holding more than 1,000 prisoners on remand, often in subterranean cells with inadequate light and ventilation, not for only a few days, but in too many cases for weeks or even for months. Whichever way we look at our custodial arrangements, for those who are convicted and for those who are not convicted there is a crisis. If a crisis of such magnitude existed in an area other than prisons, there would be a public outcry. As we all know, prisoners' rights are very low on the political agenda—in my view unwisely, because our treatment of prisoners is counterproductive to the long-term interests of society.

In his reasonable and responsible speech, the Home Secretary paid tribute to the work of the prison officers. I was somewhat surprised and disappointed by the comments of the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley). We expected her to show more understanding of the pressure under which prison officers have to work.

I remind the House of what massive overcrowding means for those who are working in the prison service. Some prisons contain double the number of prisoners for which they were built. Two or three prisoners are being held in a cell that was designed for one person. Prison officer numbers are often below establishment. About one third to one half of all prisoners are locked in their cells for 23 out of 24 hours each day. Education facilities have been cut back and the association of prisoners with each other is limited. The Home Secretary acknowledged the importance of prisoner association in preventing incidents, such as suicide. Exercise, sport and access to workshops are all restricted, to say nothing about sanitation.

In those conditions, prison officers can attempt to do only one aspect of their job—containment. They can do nothing about educating, training or guiding prisoners in an attempt at rehabilitation. The result is that they are trapped in a vicious circle, which leads to prisoners being more difficult to contain. I hope that Conservative Members will join the Home Secretary in dropping their criticism and blame of prison officers and that they will work with prison officers to make Fresh Start a reality. The Home Secretary promised prison officers that by 28 February there would be full manning levels to enable Fresh Start to begin. That promise has not been fulfilled, so it is not surprising that prison officers feel that it is difficult for them to work under their present conditions —that it it difficult to tolerate the intolerable.

Those who are involved with prisons and penal policies —prison officers and civilian staff in prisons—agree that there is a crisis. The report of Her Majesty's inspector of prisons illustrates clearly that crisis. Boards of visitors in gaols from Leicester to Wandsworth have expressed exasperation about their pleas for action having been ignored, thus proving the case for the introduction of minimum standards. The probation service, which has not been discussed in great detail in this debate, believes that the mental and physical deterioration of prisoners who are on remand is extremely severe and that prisoners are not always adequately represented in court because they have been "lost" in the system.

We have been considering what should be done. I want to consider two aspects: first, how the present prison population can be reduced, a point with which the Home Secretary did not deal, and, secondly, how further increases in the prison population can be prevented. Every time the Home Secretary has introduced panic measures to reduce the prison population—for example, by increasing remission in July 1987, which we supported—there has been a quick resumption of the relentless climb in prison numbers, which proves that short-term measures are not the answer.

The Home Secretary could introduce several measures to reduce the prison population that would have a direct impact. First, he could introduce a supervisory scheme. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook referred to the significant contribution that that could make. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department will be able to say with which of his predecessors the Home Secretary agrees and whether any movement can be expected in the near future.

Secondly, the Home Secretary should do more about the delays that people experience before they appear in court. There should be a national system of time limits, not just the slowly-slowly approach that the Government have adopted so far. The Home Secretary has never explained why there cannot be a national system.

Thirdly, Ministers should think again about clause 139 of the Criminal Justice Bill. The clause will increase the number of people held on remand as it allows remand periods of up to 28 days. Fourthly, the Government should reverse the decision of the Nottingham justices so that those who are charged and held on remand are provided with sufficient opportunity to make their case for being released on bail.

All these measures would reduce, to varying degrees, the immediate pressure on our prisons. None of them would increase the risk to society, a point that we must all bear in mind.

In the longer term, there must be a change in sentencing policy. We send a higher proportion of offenders to prison than most of our European neighbours and we have a high level of recidivism. Six out of 10 prisoners are back in prison within a relatively short time, which does not exactly prove the success of that approach. We need to look at the principles of sentencing.

It is clearly common ground that those who are convicted of serious and violent crimes, including anybody who might be a danger to society, should receive custodial sentences, but for those who are convicted of less serious offences the courts should first consider non-custodial sentences. The Government could have helped to ensure that by accepting our amendment to the Criminal Justice Bill, which would have required courts to state why a non-custodial sentence was inappropriate. That would have been one way to deal with the disparity of sentencing policy in our courts, to which the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West referred.

Those who appear before the courts in one part of the country rather than another are far more likely to receive custodial sentences. There is a marked difference in sentencing policy. In Rotherham, only 8 per cent. of adult males who appear before the courts are given custodial sentences, whereas at Tower Bridge 39 per cent. of adult males receive custodial sentences. In Bournemouth, 12 per cent. receive custodial sentences. In Brighton, 25 per cent. receive custodial sentences. The Government must surely agree that greater consistency is needed. I hope that they will look again at our amendment as one way towards achieving that aim.

Today, as on other occasions, the Government have said that they wish there to be greater use of non-custodial sentences, but as yet they have done little to ensure it. The probation service is willing and ready to take on more supervision of offenders in the community. A sufficient number of alternatives, including intensive supervision, already exists. The probation service does not need more powers to extend its work. If the courts would use these as alternatives to prison rather than just as alternatives for those who would not receive a prison sentence anyway, more constructive work could be done by the probation service.

The probation service wants to emphasise the constructive side of its work. It views with dismay parts of the draft national standards for community service orders. The fact that physical work should be stipulated, as suggested in the draft, could cut across the positive approach that is now proving to be successful in so many areas. What is more, the option of expanding the probation service would also save public money. That must surely appeal to the Government.

To keep somebody in prison costs £252 a week. To keep somebody in a probation hostel costs £155 a week. Somebody who is on a probation supervision order costs £15 a week and somebody who is on a community service order costs only £13 a week—a very striking difference. If we were discussing prisoners who are a threat to the public, cost would not come into it, but we are talking about the vast majority of prisoners—petty criminals, for whom there should be an alternative to prison, an alternative that would provide benefits for the prisoner and for society.

The probation service has shown that, for £2·5 million, 3,000 additional people could be kept out of prison. That seems to me a wise investment, especially in view of the amount that is to be spent on prison building. It would achieve a great deal in a short time.

It is not in the public interest for Ministers to get so carried away by their rhetoric about being tough with criminals that they lose sight of the main problem. I repeat the point of agreement. We all believe that custody is right for dangerous and violent criminals, but if we are to stop others falling into a cycle of crime we need a different emphasis. Our sentencing policy pushes someone with a conviction into a crime trap, where prison increases the likelihood of his reoffending and drives a rift between the prisoner and his home, family and community, all of which might have helped to prevent his reoffending.

All of those who work in the penal system—the prison officers, probation officers, educationists and medical staff —rightly demand a system that they can operate successfully, and society rightly demands a system that will protect them effectively. It is our duty to ensure, and I hope that with co-operation on both sides we shall ensure, that we provide such a system.

6.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): This has been an important debate, and it has certainly been a rare one. The House is grateful to Mr. Speaker for giving us this opportunity to debate prisons. It has enabled us at least to bring together in a coherent whole the various policies that we are pursuing in our conduct of the prison service and of criminal justice.

My only regret is that the debate has been so short. Several hon. Members who wished to participate and had much to say have necessarily been excluded, most notably perhaps my hon. Friends the Members for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler), for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) and for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard). Their absence and inability to contribute is a loss to our debate. It is a pity, too, that the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) was unable to speak.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene. I appreciate his generosity in referring to those hon. Members who have been unable to contribute to the debate.

My hon. Friend will know of my concern about Ford open prison. I hope that he will say something about open prisons. He will know the problem of categorising prisoners, with violent prisoners coming through the system and upsetting the delicate balance of the local community, the problem of lack of records, about which I know he is concerned, and, above all, the shortage of staff, and of his Department's not responding to recommendations of his own inspectorate. If my hon. Friend covers those points he will do a great service to many of us.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) has shown that in a few crisp words one can encapulate a speech that some hon. Members would take 15 minutes to deliver. I have had the opportunity to discuss those points in private and otherwise, and my hon. Friend will know my reactions to what he has said.

At the heart of our problem, as has been focused correctly by many hon. Members, is overcrowding. This has been caused by the steady increase in the number of prisoners who are committed to the prison system by our courts. But we should be under no illusion about this. In committing people to prison in ever-increasing numbers, the courts are broadly reflecting public attitudes and opinion. A penal policy that is not in accord with the grain of public sentiment is difficult to sustain over a long time. It is important to focus on public opinion because, if we are to make changes in this sphere, it is necessary to carry the public with us. We must understand the premise on which we stand.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the Minister agree that 20 years ago when somebody went to prison everyone in the street, school, club and pub knew about it, and it was a public disgrace? It is now becoming so frequent to go to prison that when it is referred to in the school, club or pub people say, "Johnny has just gone away for a couple of months, ha, ha, ha!" Prison has lost its meaning because it is over used.

Mr. Hogg: I do not think that is right. Prison has not lost its meaning; it serves as a deterrent. As I shall suggest, I do not believe that everybody who is in prison should go to prison, but that is a different point.

One of the major causes of overcrowding in our prison system is the rapid increase in the remand population, which, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, is now about 22 per cent. of the whole prison population. I find it deeply disturbing that so many unconvicted people are held in custody, and I find it even more disturbing when I reflect that the presumptions are precisely contrary to a refusal of bail. These are matters upon which we need to focus.

There are a number of things that we can do about the remand population. First, we can appoint more judges; and we are doing this. Secondly, we can ensure that more bail places are made available; and this we can do. We can ensure that the courts receive more information about defendants, which we are doing as well. We can ensure that the Crown Prosecution Service is more consistent in its approach to bail questions, and we can impose time limits.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and his hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) asked why we do not introduce time limits at once. Our intention is to have the time limits in place in England and Wales by 1990. We do not think that it is possible to do that country-wide sooner, because the courts and other relevant institutions will not be able to make an effective response to bring in time limits sooner than 1990.

Mrs. Ann Taylor rose——

Mr. Hogg: I am sorry not to give way to the hon. Lady, but I have only four minutes in which to complete my reply.

We must not forget that we are talking about judicial systems and decisions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving) rightly said, judges are very independent, and jealous of that independence. But, at the same time, we are in the business of asserting and repeating that bail should be refused only if there are grave and compelling reasons for its denial. The presumptions are and must remain in favour of granting bail.

Several hon. Members have stressed that people are in prison who should be elsewhere. Anybody who has dealt with the criminal courts knows that that is true. I do not believe, however, that the solution to that problem can be found in denying to courts an ability to send people to prison for the range of offences that attract custodial sentences. It cannot be right to argue that only those who are guilty of violent offences should serve a prison sentence. The courts must have the power to send to prison persistent burglars or, say, the recidivist thief. I am glad that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook agrees with me.

At the same time, we need to devise and come forward with a yet wider range of alternative sentences, not involving custody, but of a nature that implies real punishment, entails real control and is accepted as doing that by both courts and public alike.

In the few minutes remaining, I shall deal briefly with prison officers, upon whose compassion, good sense and discipline the weight of the prison system rests. As my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) said, we have had our differences with those who represent prison officers. I deeply deprecate their willingness to resort to industrial action, which I find difficult to reconcile with the fine traditions of the ordered and disciplined service that I have come to admire. It is also right to say that the ordinary prison officer is a fine public servant doing a difficult and somewhat unpleasant job in a disciplined and professional manner. We have recognised that fact by the introduction of Fresh Start, which has done away with the necessity of working long hours of overtime and established a higher degree of continuity and job satisfaction in an important public service.

It is inevitable in a short debate that I should omit many points, and I apologise for that. But this is an occasion for some broad points to be made. No person, whether convicted or unconvicted, should be committed to prison unless justice and the public interest require it. At all times, we must remember that prisoners will be discharged back into the community. It is better for us all that the regime that we administer does not degrade more than is inevitable. In degradation lies alienation and the loss of self-respect, and that is dangerous to us all. Therefore, we need to improve the quality of life that is to be found in our prison system.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

City of London (Spitalfields Market) Bill

(By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Before we begin the debate, I inform the House that Mr. Speaker has selected the last instruction on the Order Paper standing in the name of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore)—

That it be an instruction to the Committee on the Bill to consider and report to the House on the likely effects on other London wholesale fruit and vegetable markets of the proposals to transfer the Spitalfields market to Temple Mills.

I take it that there is no objection to debating the instruction with the Second Reading. I thank the House.

7.1 pm

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I start by explaining that the Paymaster General, the right hon. Member for the City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), is muted as a Minister and is not permitted to speak on legislation such as this.

For a variety of reasons, I was delighted to take on the task of presenting legislation on behalf of the City. I explain at once that I have no financial interest. I am an old citizen. I went to the City of London school. My father worked at Smithfield market for some 15 years, so I know the high quality of City markets. I am a member of the Guild of Freemen of the City of London. I look forward to the City of London administering Hampstead heath in the not-too-distant future.

As I see it, opposition to the Bill is divided into two, or perhaps two and a half, sides. Some of my hon. Friends have constituency interests or trade interests. I hoped to convince them to support the Bill or to let it go to Committee, where their points could be thrashed out. However, I am delighted to say that agreement has been reached between the Covent Garden market authority, its tenants and the corporation, which means that the authority no longer objects to the Bill. Some Opposition Members have legitimate constituency interests. I hope to persuade them to let the battle of detail occur in Committee, rather than to try to prevent the Bill having a Second Reading.

Those of us who have witnessed City debates over the years know that some members of the London Labour party have a pathological hatred of the corporation of London. Indeed, they tried to abolish it, but they failed, even when there was a Labour Government. If they were objectively to look at the corporation's record, they would see every reason for backing the Bill and not opposing it.

Officials of the corporation wrote to all hon. Members who put down a blocking motion, and invited them to meet them and to hear the facts. That offer was taken up by only two of my hon. Friends. I can only assume that the other signatories did not wish to be confused by facts.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I hope that the hon. Member will not continue in the vein of his last sentence. The issues are fairly well cut and clear, and we know exactly what our position is. The objectors—certainly those from the London borough of Newham—have been dealing with the market traders who are most affected. They are in consultation with the City of London.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

There was close liaison. It was not a matter of our not wanting to meet City representatives; there was just no point in doing so.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Over the years, I have blocked many Bills. As a Member of Parliament, I considered that it was my duty to meet those who were directly promoting the Bill to know what was behind it.

The City has tried to overcome and meet legitimate fears. If I should suddenly disappear during the debate, it may be to get information from Heaven, as it were, although I am glad that one of my hon. Friends will assist me in that regard.

I shall briefly explain the purposes of the Bill. It is to relocate the present market in Tower Hamlets to a fresh site in the London borough of Waltham Forest, although a tiny spot of the new site is in Hackney. It is to adapt and to amend many of the local enactments that are applicable to Spitalfields so that they apply to the market on its new site, but otherwise to make no significant changes to market regulation law. It is also to require the corporation to offer accommodation in the relocated market to traders at Spitalfields market and at Stratford market, which is about one and a half miles from the relocation site. The only reason why the Bill must be promoted is that any proposal to move the market elsewhere and to apply existing legislation can be authorised only by an Act of Parliament.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the Bill is before us because the present Spitalfields site is governed by statute? Parliament must give approval to redevelop that site. But approval is not required for the establishment of a market at Temple Mills. Indeed, if the Bill goes through, a new statutory market will be set up in Temple Mills, which does not require a statute, competing with a non-statutory market, that of Stratford in my constituency.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I thought that I made it clear that the only reason for the Bill was to apply existing regulations to a new site. The only way to do that is by introducing a new Bill.

The Bill is brief. It has a short title, definitions and an appointed day, so that one may advertise the making of the resolution for the alteration of the site. It provides an appointed day so that the new site may be substituted for the existing site, and that all obligations and liabilities shall go to the new site and operate on the new site as from that day.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): My hon. Friend explained that, under the existing statute, it is necessary to bring the measure before the House because it proposes to move the market site. Notwithstanding that, and the fact that there will be redevelopment on the old site, which I understand is in the London borough of Tower Hamlets, will he confirm that both sites and both development proposals have been given planning permission by the respective local planning authorities? Presumably they will have taken local opinion into consideration, even though the Secretary of State thinks that it is not necessary on this occasion to hold a public inquiry.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I answer my hon. Friend briefly by saying yes, but I shall deal later with planning implications.

One clause sets out the details of offering sites to traders at Spitalfields and Stratford markets. It is important to emphasise that both groups of traders will be offered sites and will be able to occupy new accommodation at the same time. If hon. Members bear that point in mind, they will see why it is relevant to Stratford market. Another clause provides for a slightly higher scale of fines for road traffic offences in the new market. Clause 7 repeals parts of the Spitalfields enactments that are totally spent or otiose. Clause 8 is formal, and shows that all costs of the Bill have been met out of the general rate of the City.

If the Bill is not carried, Spitalfields market will remain in its present condition. It will not close, because it is a good market in which there is only about 1 per cent. of vacant trading space, but it will decline and contract as a result of buildings growing older and becoming increasingly unsuitable for modern handling and storage techniques. There will be continuing heavy traffic congestion in the area and limited parking facilities for traders' and buyers' activities. One cannot resolve those problems by renovating existing buildings. So the problems, which are already well known to anyone who goes to Spitalfields, as I have done on and off for more than 30 years, are obvious.

As the market slowly declined, bits might well be redeveloped, but there would be no opportunity of redeveloping the whole to a proper development brief which would provide significant planning gain. Therefore, although there might be modest developments, those who saw that the Bill had not gone through would not be interested in putting resources into a major scheme.

The City explains the situation in the brief that has gone, I think, to every Member of the House, and I want to make only four points at this stage.

The corporation reached its decision only after lengthy tendering processes. It took close account of the traders' wish to move to the Temple Mills site and no other. The development group had obtained planning permission from the London borough of Tower Hamlets for the proposed redevelopment of the Spitalfields site from the London borough of Waltham Forest for the construction of a new market building on the Temple Mills site and from the London borough of Hackney for an access road. So three local authorities—Tower Hamlets, Waltham Forest and Hackney—have given their approval. Alas, I have to report that none of them is controlled by the Conservative party.

The case for the move rests upon a variety of propositions. At present Spitalfields is grossly unsatisfactory in planning and traffic terms, and there are many more desirable uses for the site than as a wholesale market. The existing buildings, as anyone who has examined them will know, are unsatisfactory and need extensive work. There is need for rationalisation of markets in east London. That has been considered on previous occasions and it is believed that this fits nicely into what was seen. Temple Mills is the best available site because there is not much likelihood of the site for a large modern market with modern access, ancillary facilities and parking being available elsewhere. The Spitalfields traders overwhelmingly support the move, to the extent of about 80 per cent. of their number.

Unsuccessful efforts were made which would have moved the market to the site of the Stratford market in the constituency of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). Indeed, it was the only possible site other than Temple Mills. Stratford market comprises between 20 and 25 traders—about a quarter of the number at Spitalfields—but its site would be large enough for a combined market. However, it has many disadvantages. The road network at Temple Mills is better than that at Stratford and will be even better when the M11 extension has been completed in about 1993. The M11 extension would not greatly assist the market at Stratford. The Stratford site is not owned by the company that put in the development proposal but is owned in part by the gas board, and its land is known to be polluted. The Stratford site has a variety of entrances and exits which make it much less secure and more difficult to manage than the Temple Mills site, which would be enclosed, with only one main access and egress point.

There is a considerable number of residential dwellings in the vicinity of the Stratford site and the market would therefore be environmentally less acceptable than on the Temple Mills site, which has alongside it basically only railway marshalling yards and sports fields; and 110 Spitalfields traders would have to relocate to a new market at Stratford, while the 20 to 25 Stratford traders would remain where they are. The Spitalfields traders could not accept that state of affairs because it would give those already in situ an unfair advantage, whereas at Temple Mills all would start at the same time, and with incomparably better accommodation.

There are at Spitalfields about 30 residential tenants. Many of them have the right to buy under the appropriate legislation and the corporation has promised to keep them informed of development proposals, which it has. It is perhaps worth noting that those tenants have formed a body called the Spitalfields market residents action group. That body has not petitioned against the Bill. Indeed, many of the residential tenants are in favour of the proposed move of the market but wish to remain in their existing accommodation if that move takes place. This can be achieved because in the development plans the residential units have been included in the building lease to the development group, but the corporation will take back a long lease of those units, notwithstanding that there was a quite considerable reduction in the valuation thereby.

The agreement with the developers makes it clear that, while demolition works and the construction of new buildings are going on, they will comply fully with the corporation's requirements for the protection of residential sub-tenants. In its planning agreement Tower Hamlets has restricted work on the site to between 8 am and 6 pm, from Monday to Friday and 8 am and 1 pm on Saturdays. Environmental health officers will of course have powers to stop operations that are a nuisance.

The Spitalfields development group has offered the Spitalfields traders the sum of £7·5 million and the Stratford traders the sum of £1,125,000, through their respective tenants' associations, if the Bill is enacted and the move takes place. This will help the traders to relocate. None of that money is being offered by the corporation.

As I have said to my hon. Friends whose objections have been met by the undertaking that has been drawn up between the Covent Garden market authority and the corporation—and I have a particular interest in the Covent Garden market because I think that I am the only Member present who served on the Committee when we reconstructed the finances of the authority in 1977—I do not believe that its future is in any way threatened by the Bill's proposals.

There were two anxieties. One was that the new Spitalfields market would be too large for the combined markets at Stratford and Spitalfields. That was not the intention and it would not have been sensible. That has been made clear in the undertaking. The second anxiety was that low rents would be used to attract Covent Garden tenants. Again, that is covered. It would be foolish for the corporation even to have thought of doing that. The undertaking makes the situation clear.

As for the size of the market, planning permission has been obtained for a market hall of some 300,000 sq ft gross. That was settled by measuring the trading area and the storage space and making allowance for the extensive use that is made of the public highway to store goods. Planning permission also includes 40,000 sq ft for any Stratford traders. But the planning permission represents the optimum provision and there is no intention of creating additional trading space. Any trader who wanted to lease a larger area would have to make out a very strong case. An undertaking was given and that has now been passed on.

Much of what is said in the various instructions shows —it may not be intended, but this is how it appears—a desire to interfere in the proper local government planning business. Each of the responsible local authorities has looked at these proposals and given, in its own respect, planning approval. I can imagine the uproar if a proposal had come from the Conservatives to interfere with local authority planning proposals in a matter such as this.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): To set the record straight, I should tell the hon. Gentleman that the proposal to give planning permission to the Spitalfields market development has never been debated by Tower Hamlets council. It was voted on there, but under the extraordinary, almost bizzare, arrangements of the council, the borough is divided into five or six neighbourhoods, and it was left to a neighbourhood group to come to the decision, which I think was made on a majority of two.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I remember that a majority of one in the House was sufficient to nationalise shipbuilding, a rather dubious decision.

I have here a letter from Councillor Patrick Streeter who makes the position clear:

> "The Council . . . supports the relocation because it will make possible a significant improvement in the environment of West Spitalfields, particularly reductions in heavy vehicle movements at night time, and in problems of rubbish disposal."

He also confirms the

> "Council's support for the relocation of Spitalfields Wholesale Market to the proposed site at Temple Mills."

If the right hon. Gentleman is saying that the borough council of Tower Hamlets acted illegally or improperly, he has his remedy, and so has anyone else, by going to law, but he knows that the council has acted within the law, otherwise it would have been challenged.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the three councillors who represent the Spitalfields ward are opposed to the proposal?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: It is interesting that most of the people who live there are not, which is somewhat different. Nothing was said a moment ago to prove that the proposal interferes with the planning wishes of a local authority.

Support has come, as I said, from Tower Hamlets council. Perhaps just as important is a letter from the chairman of Spitalfields market tenants' association who says:

"From the very outset I have personally supported the move for relocation and was more pleased than anyone that more than 80 per cent. of my Association voted in favour of the move . . . The proposed site at Temple Mills offers a self contained and purpose built market on a secure site . . . It offers both suppliers and customers a very high standard of handling facilities . . . On site, control and efficient vehicle circulation with improved parking facilities . . . will be conducive to good training conditions and attractive access for employees . . . The fact that the site is enclosed will enable much better control to be exercised over what is now an escalating problem of unsupervised rubbish dumping."

I paid a visit there yesterday at approximately 3 o'clock and, even though the local authority is paid to clear away the rubbish, the area was a disgrace. If the three councillors for the ward were doing their job, they would be active in trying to get the place cleared up. I suggest that anyone who went there at 3 o'clock might not want those conditions to continue.

I have tried to be brief. There is a lot more that I could explain, but I shall reserve the rest of my remarks for later. The issues are complex in their intertwining but simple in their objective. The local authorities are in favour. The Spitalfields traders are in favour. There are safeguards for Covent Garden and fair offers for Stratford. I do not think I can do better than end with one more quotation from the letter from the chairman of Spitalfields market tenants' association—this may cover the point in the instruction:

"An East London complex which offers accommodation to traders from Spitalfields and from Stratford will, in my view, result in a sensible rationalisation of fruit and vegetable sales and distribution in London. Our enthusiasm is strong and our commitment to the move beyond doubt. My Committee feels . . . that we are now presented with a chance of moving from a market built for horses and carts to a market designed and built for the 21st century. This is not a moment to support restrictive practices or to fight progress but to take up the challenge and secure Spitalfields Market for a further century or two."

That was to be my last quotation but perhaps I ought to make just one more. It is from a letter dated 10 May from the Transport and General Workers Union to all TGWU-sponsored Members of Parliament; in the list are Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Syd Bidwell, Mr. Peter Shore, Mr. Allan Roberts and about thirty others. The letter says:

"I am writing to you now as a matter of urgency to inform you that in the last couple of days my branch has reached a satisfactory agreement with the SMTA with regard to compensation for our members. We have therefore withdrawn our petition against the Bill and, once again, are keen to give it our unreserved support. May I urge you therefore to do all you can on 12th May to support the passage of the Bill.

Yours fraternally

Markets Officer, TGWU."

7.25 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): The Bill is about two issues. The first covers the transfer of Spitalfields market to a new site at Temple Mills in the borough of Waltham Forest. The second is about the points that arise from the proposed redevelopment of the 11-acre site which Spitalfields market comprises in the borough of Tower Hamlets. The two issues are indissolubly linked.

One major defect of the private Bill procedure is that the Bill deals with the transfer of the market. Of course, that is one reason why we have a somewhat incongruous person on the Treasury Bench—the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I readily acknowledge that he has an interest in the matter, but I doubt whether he would claim that it was the predominant interest among those affected by the Bill. One would have thought that a Minister from the Department of the Environment would have been a more appropriate person to speak on the Bill. I say that without wishing to quarrel with the Minister of State.

There have been defects in the speech of the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg). He could not, or did not wish to, deal with the major issue of what is to happen to an important and crucial inner city site. I have no objection to his expounding on the clauses of the Bill and on his belief, which I challenge, about the sentiments and motives of various people who were quoted by him, as well as many others who were not.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I made it clear that I was making a brief speech. I could have explained the matter in considerable detail, but the House does not like lengthy speeches. I should be delighted to explain in much more detail, if the right hon. Gentleman wants it, exactly what will happen, but I think the right hon. Gentleman knows. I shall leave him to it, but I shall follow up what he says if need be.

Mr. Shore: Perhaps I should declare an interest. I am the Member of Parliament who represents the City of London Spitalfields market area. I have had intimate contact with the whole of that area for the past 25 years.

I said that it was a major defect of the Bill that it dealt only with issues relating to the transfer of the market. There is no mention of the redevelopment proposals for the Spitalfields market site. Although it was referred to in the hon. Gentleman's introductory remarks, there is no mention of the Spitalfields development group which is the principal agent of change, not only to provide the alternative market site in Temple Mills but to build a new market there, and which is to redevelop the vacated market site in Spitalfields.

The link between the provision of a new market at Temple Mills and the redevelopment design for the old Spitalfields market site is crucial. Meeting the cost of relocating to Temple Mills is possible only because of the large profits that the Spitalfields development group believes that it will make from its own proposals for the redevelopment of the present Spitalfields market site. The attraction of the whole package to the City of London corporation is the large capital sums and ongoing revenues that it will receive as a result of the deal. My speech must inevitably deal with the issues of relocation of the market and with the larger issue of the redevelopment of the Spitalfields market site.

On the question of relocation, I begin with the preamble to the Bill, which states:

"(1) The age and condition of Spitalfields Market is such that the market fails to meet modern market needs and practices and the situation of the market is inconvenient for transport facilities and proper regulation:

(2) The impracticability of providing satisfactory accommodation for the market in new premises on or near the site of the existing market makes it expedient that provision be made to move the market to a new site available at Temple Mills in the London Boroughs of Hackney and Waltham Forest."

Those are highly contentious assertions, as the City of London corporation knows. They are challenged in at least three of the six petitions that have been deposited against the Bill. We learnt from the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate that that number has been reduced by one. The Transport and General Workers Union, about which I will comment in a moment, has also dropped its petition.

The City of London corporation acknowledges in its report of 22 October 1987 on the future of Spitalfields market that there was "no overriding reason to relocate the market. We were aware, however, of an apparent desire on the part of the Market Traders and possibly the London Borough of Tower Hamlets, for the market to be moved."

Of course, there are problems with the Spitalfields market. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate and the City of London corporation's report agree with that view. Many of the buildings are old; the standard of cleansing is far from satisfactory; it generates heavy traffic; and there is congestion in the surrounding streets.

The report of the City of London corporation concluded:

"despite these factors, the market is relatively successful and it has to be said that not all the problems are insurmountable: e.g. with the co-operation of the local authority (Tower Hamlets) and the Metropolitan Police much could be done to alleviate rubbish dumping and traffic congestion respectively. More space could be found in the area for vehicle parking and the Corporation could consider taking control of the surrounding streets in order to regulate the whole trading area."

Let us be clear at the start. We are not dealing with a decaying market that is no longer profitable so that its transfer to an alternative site is imperative. On the contrary, we are dealing with a market which—in the words of the City of London corporation—is "a victim of its own success."

The corporation does not add much to its case with the assertions in its recent brochure in which it stated:

"Establishing a market at Temple Mills meets the objectives set out in the 1985 report of the Conservative Back Bench Horticultural Committee which was chaired by Sir John Wells. The Committee envisaged three London markets in the 1990s, west, central and east, and wanted the Corporation to run the eastern market.

A similar objective was expressed in the published conclusions of the O'Cathin report 1981 that was commissioned by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food."

The City of London corporation, having little solid backing for its case, is quoting what would appear to be two authoritative reports. But that is not so. The report by Sir John Wells—a former colleague who represented Maidstone and was a considerable horticultural grower himself, especially of fruit—was never published. The public cannot assess in any way what weight to attach to what he had to say. The O'Cathain report has also remained unpublished. The report was prepared primarily to consider the grading of horticultural produce. The report did not make any proposal for the relocation of the Spitalfields market, but found that, of all the London fruit and vegetable markets, it was the one working most effectively. That deals with the alleged authority of those two reports.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Today I made inquiries of the House of Commons Library to find out whether the O'Cathain report, commissioned by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the 1980s, had been published. I was informed that not only had the research paper not been published, but that it was not available in the House of Commons Library. I have made inquiries, and one firm conclusion of the report was that the Government should be responsible for a strategic plan for the markets of London. It seems odd that we have not received that strategic plan or any movement towards the development of such a plan. In fact, the Government are giving tacit support to the piecemeal development of London markets by means of a private Bill.

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend reinforces my point. I will come later to the question of the strategic planning of horticultural markets in London.

The retention of the market in Spitalfields has been the consistent view of the Tower Hamlets council, which throughout the 1970s rejected proposals to relocate the market. The council changed its mind only last year when a new Liberal council gained control of the town hall with a majority of two. Relocation is not confined to whether the existing market can continue to be viable or is capable of improvement. As the petitions made clear, there is anxiety in Stratford about the adverse effects on the existing market of the proposed transfer to Temple Mills, which is only one and a quarter miles away. I shall not pursue the issues involved in the Stratford petitions because I know that my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) will have a good deal to say about that matter.

Worries of a different kind about relocation are contained in the petition of Mr. Alan Thomerson, on the grounds that the Bill

"fails to offer a better situation at the new site, except in so far as within the actual bounds of the new site, whereas the external traffic generated by the market will only add to an already traffic-saturated area."

That is his judgment of the proposed new site. It should be noted that this petitioner is a director of four companies trading within the Spitalfields market.

Another major relocation issue was raised in the petition of the Covent Garden authority and the Covent Garden tenants' association. We have learnt from the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate that that has now been withdrawn. Nevertheless, it is worth considering the points that those organisations made. They point out that there are currently five wholesale horticultural markets in London. Their major contention is that, due to an increase in direct trading between growers and importers, on the one hand, and supermarket chains, on the other, the proportion of produce passing through all the London wholesale markets has declined and is likely to continue to decline. Therefore, the Covent Garden petitioners make the entirely sensible point in their petition that "before a new market is established at Temple Mills an independent assessment should be made, firstly, as to the need for such a new Market at all, having regard to the number of horticultural markets that already exist in London and the expectation of the continuing decline in the wholesale market trade; secondly, as to where would be the optimum location of any new market; and thirdly, as to the size of any new market, the need for which is shown to be justified."

[Mr. Shore]

They are also worried that the other London wholesale fruit and vegetable markets could be subjected to unfair competition from the new market at Temple Mills owing, as they put it, to the

"unduly favourable terms as to the rents payable and the costs of services and the provision of plant and equipment there, made possible by the very profitable redevelopment of the existing market by the Spitalfields Development Group."

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate has told us that they have been satisfied on that point. They have been satisfied that unduly favourable conditions, which would undermine competitiveness, would not be offered to the new tenants of Temple Mills market if it is established. However, I did not hear the hon. Gentleman say that they had withdrawn their remarks about the need for a thorough appraisal of the need for a new market and where a new market should go. Therefore, I assume that the points made then, which are serious and major points, still remain. I should have thought that common sense alone would have pointed to the need for a proper appraisal of London's need for wholesale fruit and vegetable markets before allowing any major development of the sort before us this evening to proceed.

One of our problems is that there is now no Londonwide strategic authority to give an objective appraisal of proposals of this sort. Such proposals have implications that go far wider than the concerns of the boroughs immediately involved.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Before my right hon. Friend leaves the matter of relocation, will he provide me with information linked to the point that he made about Covent Garden? Does he recall that when Covent Garden was changed to its new location at Nine Elms, further Bills had to be brought before the House on the matter of keeping it going? Far from the question of subsidy, can my right hon. Friend tell the House whether there is any likelihood of the new rents at the possible site at Temple Mills being greater than if the market remained at Spitalfields, thereby making trading conditions more difficult or adding to the costs of wholesale markets in London? Would that not be an additional factor to be looked at to ensure that conditions, apart from other factors, were appropriate at Temple Mills and that new traders could get in there just as easily as they can get into Spitalfields today?

Mr. Shore: My hon. Friend has raised an interesting point. However, the information that I have at present and the fact that the Covent Garden market tenants' association has withdrawn its petition can only lead me to assume that it has been satisfied that unduly advantageous terms will not be offered to the new tenants at Temple Mills. Similarly, I assume that the market traders now in Spitalfields have been given some assurance that the rents will not be too high.

Mr. Spearing: For how long?

Mr. Shore: I do not know. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South has raised the question of how long initial leases will last and the processes under which new leases will be negotiated.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I want to be as helpful as I can. This was agreed late this afternoon. I shall read the relevant clause of the undertaking. It says:

"Market Traders to whom the intended Act applies will be offered leases of premises at the Market Hall on the new site for a term of six years from the date of their occupation of such premises, with a rent review after three years of said term, such review to be based on the Retail Price Index from time to time, subject to a maximum increase in rents of 9 per cent. . . . During the said term no conditions of a financial character more favourable to Market Traders will be offered or granted by the Corporation and the service charge at the new site will be borne in full by the Market Traders without subsidy and the Corporation will be responsible for any service charges attributable to unoccupied lettable space."

Mr. Shore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for providing the information. I should have thought that that was a reasonable guarantee for the first six years. However, people think beyond that time. Obviously, they have to make their own judgment. The way in which rents for commercial property have been moving in London in recent years makes me believe that a substantial increase in rents can be expected in the future.

I have made the point about the Greater London council not being available to give any judgment on a strategic wholesale market site in London. With the abolition of the GLC, which previously performed that function, we now have only the London planning advisory committee to influence London planning. That is a sort of statutory committee set up in the aftermath of the demise of the GLC.

I wrote to the chief planning officer, asking whether he and his people had considered the strategic London need for fruit and vegetable markets. He said:

"Thank you for your letter dated 29 February . . . and the information on the Bill. As yet LPAC has not been able to fully consider the strategic problems of London's wholesale markets. An officer level 'Retail Topic Working Party' has considered the issue . . . They have identified the declining role of London's wholesale fruit, vegetable and flower markets . . . However, this will need much more careful research and consideration before the LPAC could give advice in any more robust form."

Therefore, there is no authority based upon the London planning advisory committee. Indeed, it goes on to say:

"The rationalisation and relocation of the wholesale markets could have significant strategic planning consequences. However, LPAC is at present fully occupied in the preparation of and consultation on Strategic Planning Advice for London to the Secretary of State for the Environment."

That consideration has come far too late to assist us in considering what the Government are proposing. I have said that it seemed to be common sense to have an inquiry of the sort that I have mentioned, and I adhere to that view.

In its recently published brochure, from which I quoted earlier, the City of London corporation makes much of the support that has so far been mobilised for the market's move. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate referred to the views of the tenants and other people connected with the market. The corporation says:

"the decision to relocate follows extensive consultation and has the overwhelming support of tenants of Spitalfields . . . the proposed move to Temple Mills is supported by the vast majority of Spitalfields Tenants and their customers. It is supported by the London Borough of Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest to grant planning permission for the redevelopment of Spitalfields Market site and the construction of the new relocated market respectively."

I do not dispute that the majority of market tenants are now resigned to the inevitability of moving. However, it is not clear to me that they ever felt that they had a genuine choice—certainly not during the past few months.

The GLC carried out a study of east end London markets in 1985. Of the 100 market tenants—there are just 100 of them—70 replied to the detailed questionnaire. A total of 59 found real advantages in the present site at Spitalfields and 69 of the 70 had no immediate plans to relocate their business. The claims of the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate and the City of London corporation about the great popularity of the move should be partially offset by that quotation.

Whatever can be said about the 100 market tenants, no such claim for support can be made on behalf of the inhabitants of Spitalfields. Indeed, I have a long list of community groups and associations, small businesses and persons living in Spitalfields who oppose the proposed redevelopment. They make up the campaign to save Spitalfields from the developers and they have petitioned against the Bill. The list includes the Spitalfields small business association, the Spitalfields community farm, the governing bodies of local schools, the tenants' associations in Herbert and Jacobson houses, Wheeler house, the Montefiore, St. Mary's and Davenant community centres, the Spitalfields housing and planning rights service, the Tower Hamlets homeless families campaign, the three councillors for the Spitalfields ward—to whom my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon) referred—and the whole Labour group on the London borough of Tower Hamlets, which is 24 councillors strong.

I might add that the redevelopment proposals for Spitalfields market have never been discussed by the Tower Hamlets council. They have been debated only in the so-called Bethnal Green neighbourhood, which includes the Spitalfields, Weavers and St. Peter's wards, where the Liberals have a majority of one.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that local authorities are entitled to delegate planning decisions to a neighbourhood committee in which a proper process is gone through and a decision taken by a majority vote? The composition of that committee reflects the balance on the council as a whole. Therefore, the decision would probably be no different had it been taken by the whole council. In any event, the site was owned by the City. Therefore, proposals for development of the site are a matter for the City and the local authority, Tower Hamlets, only has planning control——

Mr. Spearing: Only?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, only. It does not have the power to determine the development that is to take place on the site. That decision resides with the owners, the City of London.

Mr. Shore: The hon. Gentleman is over-generous to the Liberal council in Tower Hamlets. We understand his political affiliations, but he knows very well that there are many examples that we could use to show that Tower Hamlets is not the most sensitive council in Britain or London today. Indeed, it has shown a marked insensitivity in dealing with what is, after all, the biggest area for redevelopment in the borough, other than the docklands area which has been torn from the council's clutches by the London Docklands development corporation. We hoped that the 100 acres of land available would be used for the benefit of the people of Tower Hamlets. Instead, they have been used for many developments, very few of which are of benefit at all to the people of the borough.

Mr. Hughes: The right hon. Gentleman and I have identical views on the docklands corporation. The LDDC took land from the local authority, following a decision by the Government and the House over which the local authority had no control. The difference is that in this case neither the Government nor the local authority have any control over the ownership of the site. The site remains in the ownership of the City of London and the City has therefore always been the proposer of schemes. In the case of the LDDC, council-owned land was taken away by Government order and handed to the development corporation.

Mr. Shore: The hon. Gentleman understates the powerful position that development control gives to local councils. The power to say no to proposed developments is the power to initiate, or at least encourage, alternative proposals, and Tower Hamlets can justifiably be accused of failing to use precisely that power.

Let me deal with the area itself—Spitalfields—and the proposals for the market redevelopment that the Bill will release upon it. On the Department of the Environment's figures and the old GLC's index of social needs, Spitalfields is the most deprived ward not only in Tower Hamlets but in the whole of London. During a visit there last year, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales commented that it reminded him in many ways of a Third-world country. The great problems of Spitalfields are housing and unemployment. It is now as it has been for the past three centuries—a working class and multi-ethnic community. It was the main point of settlement for the Huguenot community expelled from France in 1685. It attracted the heaviest settlement of east European and Russian Jews fleeing from the pogroms of Tsarist Russia at the end of the 19th century. In the past 25 years it has become a focal point for the Bangladeshi community, which is now the largest group of residents in the Spitalfields ward.

Spitalfields' main manufacturing activitives are clothing and the leather trade. People are employed in small workshops, often in very poor environmental conditions. Although Spitalfields is an industrious community, it has high unemployment, reflecting the general contraction that has taken place in Britain's manufacturing industry. Last September Greater London as a whole had 11·9 per cent. unemployment, whereas Spitalfields had 20·4 per cent., and the figures for January suggest that the discrepancy is now even greater. The 1981 census showed that 63 per cent. of the residents were manual or semi-skilled workers. With a high birth rate and growing population in Spitalfields and with the cessation of local authority housebuilding in recent years, the housing problems of Spitalfields have become acute. Several hundred Bengali families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation are under the threat of eviction from the Tower Hamlets Liberal council. Thousands more are living in conditions of chronic overcrowding in run-down estates. No one who has had any contact with the area can doubt that its major need is for more and improved housing and modern workshops for its clothing and other industries.

[Mr. Shore]

There is virtually no land available for development in the Spitalfields area or the borough of Tower Hamlets, other than Spitalfields market. I repeat that the London borough of Tower Hamlets lost out grievously through the transfer of land by vesting orders to the London Docklands development corporation.

It is against the background of Spitalfields' clamant needs that we must judge the proposals put forward by the Spitalfield development group. The central proposal of the group—no mention of this was made by the sponsor of the Bill—is to construct three substantial office complexes, totalling 885,000 sq ft. In particular, as the city's report put it,

"The proposal to redevelop the Spitalfields site will provide office accommodation for the Financial City."

There will be a retail centre comprising approximately 80,000 sq ft of lettable space, to cater for a broad range of shopping requirements. As the Spitalfields development group put it in its own brochure, letting policy—this will really please the people of Spitalfields—

"will ensure that the mix covers a wide spectrum including quality restaurants, wine bars and cafés."

There will be 64,000 sq ft for small business units and 200,000 sq ft for housing accommodation.

A section 52 agreement has been made with the London borough of Tower Hamlets, the most important part of which is the provision of 118 units of residential accommodation to be released to the three housing associations operating in the area. In addition, there is to be a community trust with £2·5 million of capital to assist businesses and to improve the environment. Further provisions include an undertaking by the Spitalfields development group

"to use its reasonable endeavours to procure that throughout the phased programme its retained building contractors for the development . . . provide a number . . . of on-site training opportunities for persons whose normal residence is within the London Borough of Tower Hamlets in appropriate skills related to the Construction industry."

There is to be a grant of £50,000 a year to the Tower Hamlets Association for Technology Training. Premises are to be provided for a law centre and a fashion centre.

These are not negligible gains, but they must be seen against the background of the major office development in the area, the enormous financial sums which will be made by the development group and the exceptional housing and other needs of the Spitalfields community. Moreover, as we know from recent bitter experience in other parts of our borough, major office redevelopment leads to soaring site values in adjacent areas. Small businesses in the area of Spitalfields, which often now pay a low £3 to £5 per sq ft rental for their premises, will be faced with massive rent increases or will simply be bought up for more lucrative office and commercial development.

There will be strong pressures on local housing estates to be decanted and sold for privatisation. House prices in general will soar in the Spitalfields and Stepney areas. Already there is evidence of this. Earlier this year, in Wilkes street, in the heart of Spitalfields, a grade 2 listed dilapidated four-storey house was marketed for £250,000. On 27 January this year, the Daily Telegraph reported:

"An early 19th century cottage in Woodsere St., off Brick Lane, is attracting considerable interest at £189,000. Four adjoining terraced houses—part of the same 1826 development—are being sensitively restored for sale at £225,000 to £250,000."

That is great news, but I am afraid that not many people in Spitalfields will be able to take advantage of refurbished houses at such prices.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Will my right hon. Friend consider what can be done with the £50,000 per annum for training? A YTS trainee at an institute of technology costs about £4,500 per annum. If my calculations are right, £50,000 would enable between 10 and 12 young people to be trained. Is that in any way adequate?

Mr. Shore: I am glad that my hon. Friend has made that point because it brings out the minimal contribution to the area's training needs that this section 52 agreement will allow. My hon. Friend's point about a component of the section 52 agreement could be made about virtually all of them. They are inadequate in terms of what they supply. The members of the Tower Hamlets council were taken for a ride. They could have secured a far better section 52 agreement if they had set their minds to it and been a bit more experienced in the business of looking after a council and its needs.

Mr. Spearing: Can my right hon. Friend give us some information about the Bishopsgate site? I understand that arrangements for another 2 million sq ft of office space have already been made for that empty site. Is that not enough for the area? Would it not be better to keep the present mix and ameliorate some of the problems that may come from the development? Was the decision made by a small neighbourhood committee or by the council?

Mr. Shore: The Bishopsgate development is outside the borough of Tower Hamlets but is immediately adjacent to it. Large office developments are being made in the borough and nearby.

The overall effect on the Spitalfields community of these proposed redevelopments needs an effort of imagination to comprehend. One long-term resident of Spitalfields, Mr. Ralph Samuel, put it forcefully and succinctly in an article in The Guardian last November when he wrote:

"It should be obvious to all but the self-deceived that to stick an international banking centre in the heart of an old artisan and market quarter, a huge complex with some 6,000 executives and subalterns, is, to put it gently, a rupture from tradition.

It drives a wedge into the heart of the district, a wall of offices separating the North from the South. It destroys the century old frontier between the East End and the City, opening up the former to the spread of banking and finance. A lot of people will lose their jobs when the market is flattened and numbers of market related businesses could be expected to go to the wall . . . the market scheme will mean a social revolution, the inversion of what Spitalfields has stood for during four centuries of Metropolitan Development".

Of course, the City of London needs new offices to accommodate the expansion of financial services, following the big bang and the internationalisation of the money markets, and to house the new technology which market makers need. But office building does not have to be, and should not be, the primary claimant on all available land in the City or its adjacent boroughs. There are other values—architectural and community—that must also be defended. The trouble is that office building is by far the most lucrative form of development in inner London. If return on capital, regardless of other considerations, is allowed to be the arbiter of future development, not only Spitalfields but many other communities will be ripped apart.

Office rents in the City of London rose between 1979 and 1985 from just over £20 to just over £40 per sq ft—a 100 per cent. increase. Between 1985 and 1987—the period of the big bang—rents soared from just over £40 to about £75 per sq ft. Unfortunately, the official collection and publication of data on commercial floor space in London terminated in 1985. The Government thought that it was no longer a matter of public interest even to record, let alone guide and control, the number of new offices in the London area. Since then, figures have been unofficial and incomplete, but from the speech made by the chairman of the City of London planning and communications committee at Mansion house on 2 December 1987, we learnt that during 1987 a record 13 million sq ft of office space was under construction within the square mile.

In the City of London, planned development has been radically revised, as the recently adopted City of London local plan makes clear. That local plan has been accepted by the Department of the Environment. I know that that is not really a matter for the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, but I assure him that that is the case. The Department of the Environment and the Secretary of State for the Environment approved it. The City of London local plan said:

"Offices are the predominant land use in the City forming 65·5 million sq. ft., 68 per cent. of all floor space . . .

For the City to continue and expand as an international financial centre it must be able to provide accommodation that meets the changing needs of the financial services centre. The Corporation intends that office developments be encouraged so as to cater for these requirements."

The office boom has not been confined to the City of London. Substantial new office developments have taken place in virtually all adjacent boroughs. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South has already referred to the great development at Bishopsgate, which I understand is a development of 4 million sq ft. In Tower Hamlets 10 million sq ft are to be developed in the Canary Wharf development. I am sure hon. Members on both sides of the House saw the picture of the Prime Minister yesterday sitting on a mechanical piledriver—an appropriate instrument for her to control—digging the foundations for that development, which is now under way. The docklands light railway is now being extended to the Bank to provide direct communications with the City. Given the exuberance of the office building boom and the substantial setback that black Monday brought to the expansion of financial services, I do not know whether there will soon be an over-supply of office accommodation; but I have seen a confidential report, which cost the Tower Hamlets council £5,000. It was never published or followed up, but it showed that, in the view of the consultants who were asked to report on the matter, there was a gloomy prospect of the dangers of over-supply outside the square mile and in the Spitalfields development.

We no longer have the base of information, following the Government's abandonment of the collection of official information, by which we can seriously judge. But I am clear on one point: the 800,000 sq ft of new office space that the Spitalfields development group is to build on the Spitalfields market site will have only a marginal effect on the total supply of new offices in central London, but a most devastating effect on Spitalfields.

It is wrong that a development of such size and importance as that described in the Spitalfields development group plan for Spitalfields market should be decided by a group of inexperienced and short-sighted councillors in Tower Hamlets, by the City of London corporation and by the Spitalfields development group. Within such a group the overriding consideration is not the welfare of the people who live in the area, but financial gain. For the City of London, the owner of Spiltalfields market, the gains are enormous. From the sale of the long-term lease of Spitalfields market it will receive more than £60 million. The cost of constructing the new market and of obtaining the alternative site in Temple Mills is worth a further £34·5 million. And that is not all. The City of London corporation will receive an initial ground rent of £500,000 a year, which is about twice what it is getting from the existing rentals of Spitalfields market, rising to 5 per cent. of the rack rental of the offices, when they are developed. That is estimated to be worth about £2 million a year when development is complete.

The prospect of such rewards does not exactly encourage cool and disinterested judgment of what is best for the development of Spitalfields. For the Spitalfields development group the rewards are unknown. The group has been coy about gains and costs. The financial and property press speaks of a £500 million urban redevelopment scheme. Twelve international banks have each provided more than £26 million in loans, totalling about £315 million, to underwrite the Spitalfields development group's venture. The developers are to provide £175 million, adding up to a total of £500 million. If the City of London is to be provided with the £94 million in cash and assets that I have mentioned, and an annual £2 million of the ongoing profits from office development, there must be large rewards for the Spitalfields development group. The planning gain for Tower Hamlets is estimated at between £18 million and £20 million.

The most culpable parties to this story are Tower Hamlets council and the Secretary of State for the Environment. The council should not have given planning permission and, knowing the importance of this site, the Secretary of State should have called in the redevelopment plan for Spitalfields market, appointed an inspector and made sure that the various possibilities for the redevelopment of the site were fully and impartially considered. The public inquiry should also have considered the cases for and against the retention of the existing market, the alternatives for its relocation, and the general strategy for market development in London.

Instead, the Secretary of State has been supine and inactive. Today, he wrote to tell me that, now that all the planning procedures have gone through, he no longer has a role to play. He has written himself out of the script of the redevelopment of Spitalfields and left all the decisions to the pull of market forces and the test of profit. Covent Garden was called in, as was Coin street—but not Spitalfields. This is a classic example of the Government's inner city policy.

For all those reasons, my hon. Friends and I have tabled a reasoned amendment declining to give a Second Reading to a Bill

"which authorises the transfer of the Spitalfields Market to a different site without any previous public inquiry either into the merits of such a transfer or into the most beneficial way of redeveloping the vacated site."

[Mr. Shore]

It is for those reasons also that we tabled the three separate instructions to the Committee.

8.16 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I listened with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who is the local Member for Spitalfields. It took us back in the history of major projects and ideas for London. It was a study in negativism, claiming that if only we had a bit more time we could do something rather better. It was a study, too, of why the Labour party, which, for most of Tower Hamlets' existence, was unopposed on the council—candidates were often unopposed when standing for the council—now has a minority of seats on it. Labour Members did not understand why that happened, and the right hon. Gentleman's speech led me to believe that they still do not understand why.

I could not understand from the right hon. Gentleman's protracted remarks of whom he is supposed to be in favour. Who is he trying to protect? In whose interests was he speaking—the market traders? Plainly not. We know that they want to go to the new market at Temple Mills. Now that the objection from Covent Garden has been withdrawn—that is welcome—we have heard that without the new development at Temple Mills the market trade in London is likely to suffer. Perhaps the people of London would also suffer——

Mr. Tony Banks: I hope that, during his perambulations, the hon. Gentleman will come to the problem of Newham, because if I am lucky enough to catch the Deputy Speaker's eye I shall speak about the market interests of the traders in Stratford. I hope the hon. Gentleman will bear them in mind.

Mr. Hughes: The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney spoke for nearly an hour. I have been on my feet for only two minutes, so I make no apology for not having reached the point in which the hon. Gentleman is particularly interested, but I shall come to that.

The right hon. Gentleman's speech was not in the interests of the local people of Spitalfields who we now hear have not opposed the Bill. Was it in the interests of the people of Hackney and Waltham Forest? This is particularly interesting in terms of Labour party politics. Where are the hon. Members for Hackney? I suspect that they support the scheme and welcome the 6,000 jobs that will come to their area. We may well hear from the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), who was in the Chamber earlier. I understand that, with a few reservations, he supports the scheme. I understand that the Labour-controlled Waltham Forest council supports the scheme. Only a few people from one part of London are against it.

Mr. Leighton: We are all listening with great suspense and interest to the hon. Gentleman's fascinating statement. He says that Hackney will get 6,000 jobs. That is a nice round figure which he has obviously researched carefully. Can he explain exactly what those 6,000 jobs will be and when they will arrive?

Mr. Hughes: It is for the hon. Gentleman to make his speech. We have been hearing—[Interruption.] Does the hon. Gentleman want an answer?

Mr. Leighton: Yes.

Mr. Hughes: We have been hearing negative remarks about the jobs coming in. I suppose that the 36,000 jobs created in the London Docklands development corporation area are also a myth. Presumably they have not arrived. Presumably no one is working in that area.

Mr. Leighton rose—

Mr. Hughes: No, I shall not give way on that point. I want to move on to my next point.

Mr. Leighton: Does the hon. Gentleman want the information?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I shall certainly give way.

Mr. Leighton: The hon. Gentleman has conjured out of the air 6,000 jobs for Hackney. He is now telling us that 36,000 jobs have been created in London Docklands. The LDDC commissioned a report from Peat Marwick McLintock, a prestigious group of consultants, and those consultants looked into precisely that point. In paragraph 6(1) of their report they said:

"Its efforts"—

in trying to get employment—

"have met with limited success. Indeed, as we noted earlier there are now over 1,000 more unemployed people in Docklands than in 1981."

Where are those 36,000 new jobs? They do not exist.

Mr. Hughes: I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's precise words and I urge people to compare my point with his response. Not one thing that the hon. Gentleman has said contradicts my statistics. He merely moves on to something else.

This is a vendetta against the City corporation. It is a knee-jerk——

Ms. Gordon rose——

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way, but I should like to finish one point.

Ms. Gordon: Six years of the London Docklands development corporation have resulted in a net loss of jobs. Most of the jobs were transferred from Billingsgate and Fleet street. Some jobs were created but so many local firms were squeezed out by compulsory purchase orders that the final result was net loss of jobs. The hon. Gentleman's figures are not correct.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Lady really must keep up. I had moved on to the next point, having dealt satisfactorily with that matter. If she would like to try to keep up with the game, we shall try to answer her points.

This is a knee-jerk reaction by the Labour party. We have seen it often against anything that it does not control: if the Labour party cannot control something, it is not worth having.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney told us that he would address part of his remarks to what was going to happen on the Spitalfields site, suggesting that my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) had neglected to do so. I listened carefully to what he said, but we did not hear one solid reason why the Spitalfields site should not be redeveloped. We did not hear one well-argued objection to what is proposed for that site. Nor did we hear any constructive analysis of what will happen on that site. I listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said, but on those points he said nothing constructive.

The Labour party accuses Conservative Members of talking glibly about inner city regeneration Opposition Members say that we have no plans for the inner city. The answer is simply that when a scheme such as this comes along we take a positive attitude towards it. We look at such schemes and ask whether they can provide something new for the people of London. It is the Labour party which has a negative attitude.

Spitalfields has a varied and multiracial population which forms the seeds of a thriving community. I accept that there is poverty and deprivation, but with the seeds of a thriving community it deserves the opportunity that the scheme will provide. For years its people have been either patronised or ignored—I refer in particular to the Bengali community—by the Labour party. Hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree that the treatment of those people by the Liberal council has been shameful. Both parties who have controlled Tower Hamlets council have treated them shamefully. The Bill, provides many opportunities for them. It provides opportunities for London and for the local people.

Mr. Tony Banks: It says here.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, in my notes.

We heard some rather shide comments from the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney about the £2·5 million net in rents that will come into the City of London from this development each year. But he neglects to tell the House that 80 per cent. of the money that comes into the City of London corporation is redistributed to London boroughs. Boroughs such as Tower Hamlets and Hackney will be the beneficiaries of the £2·5 million per year. That money is not going just to the City of London corporation.

What we have seen displayed tonight, and I am confident we shall see it displayed a lot more, is a consistent lack of vision by the Opposition—a lack of vision which means that they always try to oppose anything done by the London Docklands development corporation. They have suggested that few or no opportunities for work have been created. Presumably they do not accept that one quarter of the houses and flats built there are now occupied by people who were previously council tenants. Presumably the self-build schemes do not involve council tenants or people who were on council waiting lists.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman may know that half the area of the LDDC is in my constituency. The first occupants of houses built by the LDDC may have come within his category, but is he aware that it is virtually impossible for any of my constituents to buy a new house in that area because they have gone up so much in value? People have been made homeless and cannot stay there. Children of families who have lived in the area for generations are being priced out by the very mechanism that he is advocating.

Mr. Hughes: It is rich for Labour Members to talk about the lack of opportunity for people in the inner cities. Probably the majority of real east enders do not live in the east end any more because of the lack of opportunities provided by the Labour party when it was in government. There were no houses to buy, so they moved out to the new towns and to places such as Upminster.

When I was involved with Stepney and Poplar as my party's candidate, 16 new maisonettes were put on the market by the GLC and 3,000 people queued to buy them. People who, according to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, did not want to buy their own homes voted with their feet and got out. The opportunities were never available then, and they may not be now, but certainly the Labour party is in no position to complain that they were not available.

That brings me to a point that I wanted to make about the LDDC. In 1979 I was my party's candidate against the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney. At the beginning of the election campaign on the Isle of Dogs —which was then in the right hon. Gentleman's constituency—I spoke to the George Green residents and tenants association. I made a promise that made the members of that association fall about laughing. They thought that I was lying. They said that I was making election bribes which could never be carried out.

I said that within 10 years there would be a new train line to their area. I am sure that no hon. Member would deny that there is now a magnificent mass transit system to the Isle of Dogs. I submit to the right hon. Gentleman, who said that the LDDC had brought nothing to his area, that that might have been a substantial gain to residents who had previously felt trapped on the Isle of Dogs.

This is another example of a major scheme that will bring great benefits to the people of the area. The Labour party again says, "Wait—wait for a strategic plan." There was always a new false dawn with the LDDC, the derelict areas of dockland and the Isle of Dogs, but never a proper scheme with any chance of succeeding. This is a scheme which will succeed; a scheme which will bring benefits to the people of Spitalfields. I believe that it will be widely welcomed by them, by the trade and by the people of London, and that it will bring great benefits to all but the narrow interests of the Labour party.

8.32 pm

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) keeps referring to negative attitudes. The real negative attitude is the naked greed of pinstriped men who lust for profits, and once again propose to blight the east end of London.

Mine is the neighbouring constituency to that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). I was born in his constituency, and I have a special interest in Spitalfields. My father was a councillor for Spitalfields, East; many of my school friends lived in Spitalfields, and I would go there to visit them and play. My sister went to Central Foundation school, which was in Spital square. I therefore know the area well, and have always considered it very special.

Even when very young, we knew of the Huguenots who had sought refuge there. We saw their buildings, with the large windows to let in light for silk weaving, and the mulberry trees in the yards where the silkworms grew. Spitalfields market was also a large part of our lives. The market received its charter in the 17th century. It is very successful, with trade totalling over £180 million in 1987, and it is fully occupied. In 1984-85, 42 of the traders had a turnover of over £1 million each, and 78 per cent. reported that their trade was improving. It is not a dying market, but a flourishing market.

There are many new dealers in ethnic food, such as vegetables imported from Kenya, and that side of trading is thriving and growing. The market supplies Bengali shops, for instance. No account has been taken of the fact that trade has arisen because of the needs of the local community. It supplies the majority of the vegetables that form a large part of their diet, food that is not readily available elsewhere.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Does the hon. Lady agree that the existing Spitalfields market does not contain the necessary facilities—cold storage or ethylene ripening facilities, for example—to accommodate the further development of the trade to which she has referred?

Ms. Gordon: I do not have the details, but I see no reason why the existing market cannot be improved. There are problems. Improvement is needed in cleaning and the removal of waste, and in the access roads. But there is no reason why the local authority cannot deal with improved cleaning facilities, for instance.

The traders have been faced with a fait accompli. The initiative has come wholly from big business. The proposal that the market should be relocated at Temple Mills, and that the site should be redeveloped, is prompted by the value of the site. The Bill has nothing to do with the condition of the market and whether it can be improved. Behind the proposal is the value of the site to the City of London corporation, and the hundreds of millions of pounds that will be made out of it by the developers.

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): Will the hon. Lady contrast the "lust for profit of the pinstriped men in the City" with the doubtless large profits that the market traders of Spitalfields are making?

Ms. Gordon: The profit that the traders in Spitalfields market are making is a mere fleabite compared with those of big business. They are not damaging the lives of local people, as the proposed developments will harm the community.

There is no knowing how the move to Temple Mills will affect the Spitalfields traders. There is no knowing how it will affect the fruit and vegetable dealers in the many smaller retail markets in the east end—and there are many such markets dotted all over the east end. People travel from miles around, not just from the east end, to get cheap fruit and vegetables. The development will be detrimental to those in the east end, Hackney and the surrounding areas. We also do not know how the move will affect traders in Stratford, but no doubt my hon. Friends who represent the other areas that will be affected by the move will deal with that.

One of the reasons given for pulling down the market is the problem of traffic. If the proposed developments are built, traffic problems in the small medieval streets around Spitalfields will be immense. That is a false argument. Spitalfields is a unique and historic area, with a high degree of social and communal cohesion. There has always been racial tolerance. It must be the only area where a building can be found that was a place of worship for the Huguenots, became a place of worship for Jewish refugees and is now a mosque. It is also an area of industry and enterprise. The majority of residents live within 10 minutes of their place of work, but that will be changed if the new development is allowed to go ahead.

I have unfortunately seen the results of the beginning of a development in my constituency, where the land is being regenerated and the community is being destroyed. That will be the pattern in Spitalfields if we allow the market to be pulled down and redevelopment to go ahead.

The local community live, work, go to school, shop and have their cultural and religious needs met within the small area of Spitalfields. The area will be changed out of all recognition by the new proposals. The proposed relocation of the market development will pose a serious threat to the continued existence of the present community.

The developers claim to be concerned about Spitalfields' heritage and its historic character. This is not just a matter of individual buildings, some of which are beautiful and date from the 18th century; it is a matter of the unique mixture of work, home, market and trades. The area's inheritance is under threat.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney has already mentioned the high unemployment rate of over 24 per cent. within Spitalfields. The Home Affairs Select Committee report on Bengalis in Britain said that this figure is likely to conceal a higher rate. As my right hon. Friend has said, the jobs that exist centre around the clothing and leather industry, and work in the market, in the shops and the cafés around it. Jobs will not be created by the new development; they will be squeezed out.

I have received case after case concerning small firms on the Isle of Dogs that employ local labour in the type of jobs for which the local people have been trained being squeezed out. Only today I received a letter from Limehouse Studios. In 1985 that company signed a new lease with the LDDC for 200 years. Now it has been informed by the LDDC that it is to be compulsorily purchased. That is a typical example of what has happened in that area and that is what will happen to artisan workshops and small businesses in Spitalfields if the Bill goes ahead.

Mr. Spearing: That example of the juggernaut of the LDDC must be compared with the fact that the Canary Wharf development was not called in for consideration. The Prime Minister was in the area yesterday. Was my hon. Friend able to tell her about Limehouse Studios? Was she able to point out that the sort of things that are happening in Spitalfields, Canary Wharf and on the Isle of Dogs are not welcome?

Ms. Gordon: I knew about the Prime Minister's visit to Canary Wharf and the earlier visit by Lord Young only from the newspapers. I was neither invited nor informed. Indeed, the mayor and the leader of the council were not informed. I believe that they walked out of a banquet in Whitehall to which they had been invited when they found out what had happened at Canary Wharf. We can expect more such behaviour in the future.

Mr. Tony Banks: My hon. Friend has just revealed that the Prime Minister acted most discourteously by not informing the constituency Member of her visit. I assume that my hon. Friend will accept that the Prime Minister must be rather careful. She is so unpopular that she is a positive incitement to violence on the streets. Therefore, she must keep her visits quiet until they have taken place.

Ms. Gordon: I take my hon. Friend's point. I must also inform my hon. Friends that Lord Young's visit was not disclosed——

Mr. Banks: He is even more unpopular!

Ms. Gordon: We must also take into account that the Canary Wharf development is unpopular with the community and that everything to do with it is shrouded in secrecy. The local people are not told what is happening in case they express their opinions in the usual east end manner.

The shops that will be built in the new development will not be those that are needed. The regulations have already been changed and the class of use has been changed to enable banks, building societies, travel agents and estate agents to be included. Sadly a beautiful old place that used to make scales—I believe that was in Paxton street—has gone out of business. It has been replaced by a new faceless computer office.

Workshops will be undermined by the rapid rise in land values that will ensue. The one thing that the people of Spitalfields and of the east end do not need is more office space. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney has already said that 27 million sq ft of office space is in the pipeline for London. Within 30 yards of the boundary of Spitalfields we can see the towering mass of the Broadgate development, which is currently under construction. That will provide about 4 million sq ft of office space. Canary Wharf will give us a further 6 million sq ft. I do not know who will occupy all those offices. Perhaps they will stay empty as their values rise, as we saw with the Centre Point development in London.

The area needs developing. There is need, not for offices, but for economically priced rented accommodation, for improved workshops and for environmental improvements that will benefit the community. There has been talk about the Liberal council negotiating a community gain. The community gain that it negotiated with the billionaire company Olympia and York on Canary Wharf was pathetic—£50,000 a year for training. The community gain for training that is attached to the Spitalfields package, should it be put into effect—I hope that it never will be—will be £250,000 over five years. It has already been pointed out that that will be less than the cost of a small house. What type of training will be provided for that? It is derisory and despicable.

Part of the community gain is the contemptible proposal for only 118 residential units on this 12 to 14 acre site. Such provision is derisory when one considers local need. Indeed, most of those units will be one or two-bedroomed units. The families in that area are large and they need four or five-bedroomed houses. The residential units will not be for them. The corporation has also told Tower Hamlets council that it wishes to have nomination rights for some of the housing. How much will that benefit local people? Not more than would go in the corner of a tooth.

The area will be turned into a ghost town. There will be a park provided and no doubt it will be full of office workers at lunch time, but it will be empty after dark and people will be afraid to go into it.

If the Bill is agreed, the sky will be the limit for land values. In Wapping, less than half a mile from Spitalfields, the price is currently £20 million an acre. That is almost unbelievable. The professional gentrifiers have already moved into Spitalfields with the yuppies in their wake.

A few weeks ago, when I was doing a television programme, one of the executives introduced himself to me and said that he lived in the neighbourhood next to my constituency. He told me that he had bought a house in Woodseer street. I expressed surprise and he told me that he had bought his house three years ago and that he had paid £52,000 for it. He said, "Islington is finished." I think that sums it up: Spitalfields is the next place for the takeover.

What will happen to the local people after the takeover? They will be priced out of the area. A very vulnerable local community will be forced out. It is worth noting that the £52,000 house is now worth nearly £200,000. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney read out some house prices, and they are soaring. If the Bill goes ahead, the same things will happen to the people of Spitalfields as have happened to the people on the Isle of Dogs. All this is even before the development begins. Flats on rundown housing estates are selling for £60,000 when the average wage of local people in the area is £100 or less. What chance do they have in this melee?

Mr. Spearing: Is not the silence of the Prime Minister and her activities possibly related to her inner city policy? Is not what my hon. Friend is describing the real inner city policy of the Prime Minister, which is colonisation by the people she likes whom she described on election night as "our sort of people"? Is that not the hidden agenda of her inner city policy for London?

Ms. Gordon: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The right hon Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) was reported in The Daily Telegraph—or perhaps it was in an article that he wrote for The Daily Telegraph—as suggesting that we need more charitable donations to solve the problems of the inner cities. He said that we must honour the men who built the workhouses. Is that supposed to be the future for the unfortunate people of east London? Do we want to bring the workhouse syndrome back to the area? The Government honour the people who built the workhouses, not those who achieved the biggest slum clearance in Europe. A Labour council built 84,000 housing units, but the Government honour those who built the workhouses.

Most of the community gains do not meet the needs of the people in Spitalfields and the adjoining areas. We need a strategy that begins to address the problem of inner city deprivation and regeneration, with social and economic responsibility. The social effect of regeneration in the American cities, the model on which this type of development is based, has been to increase poverty, to displace the local population and to create more deprivation and despair among the ethnic groups, but it has created no jobs and very little housing or other benefits for working people or for ethnic minorities.

For those reasons, the House should be examining alternative developments which will reflect the interests and needs of the people of Spitalfields and not those of the business men in the City of London. For those reasons, I support the instruction.

8.52 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I thank the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) for the generous way in which he suggested that I was an unsuitable Minister to intervene in the debate. I shall explain to him why I intervene to explain the Government's view on the Bill, and perhaps comment on one or two of the things that have been said, in a way that I hope he will find helpful.

In the traditional way, the Government are taking a neutral stance on the Bill, for it is a private Bill. If the House decides to give it a Second Reading, no doubt it will proceed in the normal way to question, to argue, and to seek to provide from it the kind of Bill that hon. Members want.

The Bill has obvious implications for horticultural marketing in London. Therefore, it is a Bill which should most properly be considered by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, not least because marketing is of increasing importance in agriculture. We have moved from a period when production was king to a period in which effective selling has become increasingly important. The market in the big centre has great importance in that. Therefore, I believe that it would be wrong to suggest that the Bill can be discussed only from the point of view of planning in the way which some hon. Members have sought to do so far. As I understand it, the Bill is concerned with the better marketing of horticultural produce and addresses itself to those problems.

There have been concerns, particularly from the Covent Garden market, that the changes might in some way affect the situation there, but I am happy to hear that those problems have been overcome and that the objection by that market to the Bill has been withdrawn. I am sure that the House also will be aware of the withdrawal of the objections from the Transport and General Workers Union. Again, it is natural that I am concerned with that, as the Transport and General Workers Union represents a majority of agricultural and other workers who are unionised. That, too, is of considerable importance to the House.

I am a little concerned about the question raised by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney about calling in the planning proposals. I should have thought that, if he felt so strongly and, indeed, if the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon) had also felt that strongly, they might at the appropriate time have asked the Secretary of State to call in the proposal.

I have some experience of that procedure because I have recently had to do precisely that in my constituency. I found out the date by which such a request had to be made and I sought to get the Secretary of State to call in a particularly objectionable proposal. I am happy to say that I succeeded. However, I had to get in my objection in time. The right hon. Gentleman did not do so. He felt strongly about it, but he put forward no objection. As the House has been asked to deal with the scheme on a planning basis, it is reasonable to say that if an objection has not been brought by the local Member of Parliament, perhaps it is reasonable for the Secretary of State to believe that he should not call it in.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister might be interested to know that the London borough of Newham did precisely that. It asked the Department of the Environment to call in the whole development and the move of the market to Temple Mills. It was refused completely by the Department.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that what the hon. Gentleman said is true. I was remarking that it did not seem to be quite such a matter of urgency and concern to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney or indeed to his neighbouring Members of Parliament if they did not feel it necessary to do that, particularly considering their view of the quality of Tower Hamlets council. I am in some difficulty here for I do not wish to intrude upon private grief. I do not have, from my memory of the days when Tower Hamlets was run by the Labour party, a brief for Tower Hamlets council in general. It seems to me that much of the deprivation in Tower Hamlets is the result of one of the worst planning systems and sets of attitudes over 40 years that can be imagined.

I remember that when I was a member of the Inner London education authority it was impossible to get teachers because Tower Hamlets borough council did not believe in building houses for sale. It wanted to municipalise the area, and it has done so, with the result that the mix of population has been destroyed and there is very little chance of it returning. The history of Tower Hamlets borough council is not so great as some would have us believe. The present borough council has procedures that some may find unusual, but it has been elected and has reached a decision.

I find it difficult to believe that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney would have been so enthusiastic about his condemnation of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had a Labour council reached that decision. If a Labour council had made such a planning decision, I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman would have been quite so concerned about the impropriety of not calling in the application. I suspect that he is more concerned about internal political arguments after the surprising—to the Opposition—change in Tower Hamlets.

Mr. Spearing: Just to reinforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said about Newham, does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that both my hon. Friend and I asked for the Canary Wharf application to be called in? The Secretary of State did not call in that application, either. Does it not suggest that there is a lack of sensitivity in the Department of the Environment and among Ministers about controversial matters that affect London boroughs?

Mr. Gummer: It has been suggested that there have been differences of opinion between Ministers in the Department of the Environment and those in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I am happy to say that on this point, as on all points, I am entirely of the opinion that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is right.

I listened to the speeches of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar. Then I listened to the interventions of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and was struck by the fact that it was all a matter of saying no, which was very sad. Then I asked myself why the London Docklands development corporation was set up. It was set up because nobody was doing anything. There was no chance of getting any policy through. Every plan to use the area in a way that any sensible city would use it was destroyed by inter-borough rivalry and Socialist dogma. My right hon. Friend was right to set up the LDDC to ensure that something is done that will be very much the envy of the rest of Europe and the world.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Does my right hon. Friend also agree that it was the inactivity of the London county council, the Greater London council and the London Labour boroughs that caused 20 or 30 years of dereliction and that it was my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) who, together with Bob Mellish, got the London Docklands development corporation working? I do not know of a better Londoner than Bob Mellish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. We seem to be straying from the confines of the Bill.

Mr. Gummer: I am sorry that we should have done so, but I think that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will agree that a parallel was drawn between the development of this important site and the development of another important site nearby. I shall not be led further down that road, apart from saying that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said how sad it was that the GLC had disappeared and how useful it would have been in these circumstances. It is the first time since the abolition of the GLC that I have heard anybody remember that we ever had a Greater London council.

Mr. Tony Banks: Silly little man.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman who has just shouted out is a——

Ms. Gordon: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gummer: I am happy to give way to the hon. Lady.

Ms. Gordon: I see people in my surgery weekly and receive letters almost daily from people who want housing transfers but who have to be told that because the GLC no longer exists there is absolutely no chance of their getting a transfer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must return to discussing the Bill. Time is very short.

Mr. Gummer: The transfer of this market to another site is a matter of concern to the planning authorities. Both the planning authorities involved have given planning permission. Waltham Forest gave planning permission in October 1986. Planning permission was given by Tower Hamlets last year. It is for a mixed development on the Spitalfields market site, comprising mainly offices, with 238 residential units, retail use for small businesses, a museum and open spaces and restaurants, subject to a number of conditions.

I hope that the House will decide whether the future site will be better than the existing one. I do not think that we can follow the line of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar, that we do not know whether this will work. That is one of the problems of any change. We must decide whether it is worth giving the proposal a chance. We ought not to be led astray by visions of naked and pinstriped people lusting for whatever it may be; how they are both I am not sure. I had better not go down that avenue, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It would perhaps be better to consider the Bill in a calm atmosphere and to put aside local party political differences, and the sad vendetta against those who make money, most of which goes to the benefit of other boroughs in London. It is those on whom our welfare services depend. It is only the wealth creation of the people of Britain that enables us to provide any of the housing for the hon. Lady's constituents, or any of the health and welfare services that we provide. Sometimes I think that those who are so generous in their attack on those who make money should remember that most other countries would be very pleased to have a financial centre of the strength and value of the City of London. Very few people shout about that in this country, but foreigners would like to have the strength and money that comes from the City.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) only shouts from a sedentary position. He has not been in the debate. The House has got used to listening to the hon. Gentleman; either he lectures us for far too long or he shouts from a sedentary position.

The Bill ought to be considered on its merits rather than against any dogmatic background. There were a number of petitioners against the Bill. Some have withdrawn their objections. We ought to ask ourselves whether it would be reasonable to allow the Bill to go to a Committee, where the petitioners would be able to put their cases. The Committee would be in a much better position than we are to examine the issues involved and to ensure that the interests of the petitioners are safeguarded. It would have the added advantage of expert advice.

The detailed arguments about the Bill must be worked out, as is customary, by the private interests involved. I hope very much that the House will feel it reasonable to give the Bill a Second Reading and to allow it to proceed in the usual way to a Committee for detailed consideration of the issues involved.

I would be sad if, given the horticultural needs and the use of markets in a modern world, when all kinds of new equipment, proper refrigeration, properly cleaned areas and hygiene have become more important, the consideration of the Bill should cease to be about that and instead become embroiled and enmeshed in a series of arguments that sound like arguments we have heard for 40 to 50 years. In a sense, those arguments remind us that much of the dereliction in London and the deprivation of London's people has been the result of out-of-date Socialist and Marxist councils.

9.8 pm

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I am intensely disappointed with the Minister's response. His last comments do him and his office no good at all.

There is no doubt that the central issue this evening is not the relocation of Spitalfields market but the nature of the communities that will be affected by the development and the changes that will be inflicted on those communities if the proposed market relocation goes ahead. There is no doubt where the Government stand on that issue. Clearly, they will support it, despite the fact that at no time during the debate have more than 10 Conservative Members been present. I have no doubt that, if hon. Members vote on it, Conservative supporters of the Bill will appear out of the woodwork, bars, dining rooms and whatever. The

[Mr. Ron Davies]

Government will have enough supporters to get the measure through the House—at least on a strong unofficial lobby. That will bring the House into disrepute.

I am sorry that the Minister has not replied to any of the real issues that have been raised. I understand that he is not in a position to do so. The issues relate to inner city development, economic policy, investment and the strength and viability of inner city communities. They also affect the strength of ethnic groupings. My hon. Friends who represent inner city areas are concerned with such issues. Of course, the portfolio of the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food does not allow him to reply to such issues. Perhaps he will explain why that is so.

Mr. Gummer: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain why, if they are the issues, the Labour party has put forward its agriculture spokesman to answer the debate.

Mr. Davies: The Minister knows as well as I do that I stand here precisely because he stands there. It was the Government's choice to put forward an agriculture Minister to reply to the debate. I am the shadow agriculture spokesman. I wish that it were the other way round, and I were the Minister. I assure the House that, if I could choose who should reply to the debate, it would not be the Minister; it would be one of the new Ministers who were trailed after the 1987 election, when the Prime Minister said, "We must now go for the inner cities." Glib promises were made by Ministers with inner city responsibilities. I would call one of them to the Dispatch Box to answer the debate.

The Minister had an opportunity to make his own speech. He neglected to do so. He missed his opportunity. I have given way to him, and I shall do so again, but he must make up his mind. I have my own speech, and I intend to make it. I shall accept interventions from the Minister when I directly refer to him, but he must recognise that he has missed his chance.

Mr. Gummer: It is up to the Opposition to decide who to put forward to speak. The only reason the hon. Gentleman makes his speech in such a way is that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), having failed to ask for a certain planning operation to be called in, is trying to make up for his constituents——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that we can now leave substance and shadow and get on to the Bill.

Mr. Davies: I am sure that the House recognises that there are well-established precedents. There are procedures to be followed. Hon. Members know why the Minister is here this evening.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) should be congratulated. There is no doubt that there is a case to be made. There is no doubt also that he presented that case as well as it could be presented. Of course, on one or two occasions, he lapsed and attempted to vent some political spleen, but my hon. Friends were tolerant and did not respond. My congratulations are sincere. There is a case to be made, and he made it.

Of course, there is an alternative case. I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) who, in his analytical approach, dissected and dispatched the case. He was well supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon). They widened the debate. The debate is much wider than the relocation of Spitalfields market.

I suspect that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has replied to the debate this evening because the Government do not wish the debate to be widened. They want to restrict it, and to be seen to be restricting it, to issues relating to Spitalfields market. But the issues are much wider than that, and it is when they are challenged on the consequences of the move from Spitalfields that they are most vulnerable.

I am sure that most of my hon. Friends view with very grave concern the developing practice of using private Bill procedures, wherever possible, not only to circumvent proper planning procedures, when necessary, but also, as we see this evening, to avoid a proper, searching public examination of the issues involved.

I went to the Library yesterday for a list of private Bills introduced during this Session. The list is too long to read out this evening. That is a measure of the extent to which the House of Commons is being used by individuals for private interests. Legislation is being presented to the House of Commons to circumvent the normal planning process and to ensure that the planning issues, or the issues of economic or community development, are not explored in a rational forum and assessed by independent planning inspectors, but are made subjects of political debate in the House. The sad consequence is that unless the Bills pass through unopposed they become the subject of political controversy that will be resolved only by the Government's wheeling out their payroll vote. All the contentious issues that we have debated in the House in recent years have been resolved only when the Government have decided to use the payroll vote to expedite the matter.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I should not like the hon. Gentleman to be under any misapprehension. This Bill has nothing to do with the planning process. That has been dealt with by the local authorities already.

Mr. Davies: I am fully aware of those issues and I fully understand that, even if there were a consensus, a Bill would have to be presented to the House to allow the move. My case is that no real attempt has been made to reach that consensus or to satisfy the very real needs of those communities, which are crying out in the torture that they are experiencing in the grotesque juxtaposition in which they find themselves—levels of poverty, which most hon. Members do not believe exist, side by side with the gross affluence that we have come to associate with the City of London. Those are the issues that should have been resolved before the Bill was presented to the House. I am sure that the matter would then have been dealt with in a very different way.

We must recognise that, however desirable that might be, it is not the case. We have to look at the controversies. We have to look at the events in this Chamber last night when we discovered that the chairman of Associated British Ports had been to visit the Prime Minister to ensure that the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill, on behalf of a privatised company, no doubt with funds flowing into Tory coffers, had her personal assistance in delivering the payroll vote.

We well remember the events of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, with P and O pouring money into the Tory party and laying on champagne receptions to get the Tories here for the vote.

In my own part of the country, we have the Cardiff bay development. I shall not stray too far, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it is relevant to this debate, because we have that intermingling of public and private funds, we have the Tory party and Government Ministers involved and, in the case of the Cardiff bay development corporation, a high Welsh Tory—there are not many of them, so all of them have to be high—appointed to public office by his brother-in-law, the Secretary of State for Wales. That is the intermingling of interests that concerns us all—the intermingling of Government and private funds, the private Bill procedure, and the Government machine getting those matters through the House of Commons.

We know where the party lines are on the Spitalfields issue. Unfortunately, there are party lines because the promoters of the Bill have not sought a consensus. We know that Tory Members will come to vote, not because they are concerned about Spitalfields market but because they know where their duty lies—supporting their friends in the City of London. They will do their duty this evening. We are all concerned because the Government cannot decide where the boundary lies between the national interest, the Government interest and the interest of the Conservative party. They seem to think that all three interests are indivisible.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney referred to the glossy leaflet issued by the Conservative Back Bench horticultural committee as justification for the measure. So we have a group of Conservative Back Benchers offering justification for this private Bill.

My right hon. Friend also raised the question of the O'Cathain report by a Right-wing economist, almost a quango groupy, employed in 1981 by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to produce a report. The report was never published. Somehow it has leaked out from the Ministry and is used by the corporation as a justification for the measure. That is a cause of great concern. Questions of propriety are involved. Shabbiness has come into the House on these matters. The result is that the whole procedure on private Bills is in disrepute. A Select Committee is considering the matter and I hope that shortly we will have an opportunity to debate its report and to redress some of the wrongs.

The Minister was surprised that I was here to reply to the debate. I gave him the reason. I am not familiar with the Spitalfields area. It is not an area to which I go every day, but, when I knew that I was to reply to the debate, I made arrangements to go to Spitalfields, and I have spent a considerable time there during the last two days. I should be grateful if the Minister could tell us whether his ministerial engagements allowed him time to go to Spitalfields. He is the Minister responsible for the Bill and he should tell us how much time he has spent in Spitalfields over the last two days.

Mr. Gummer: I am happy to say that Spitalfields is a place not only to which I go, but which I go through regularly—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who spends most of the time shouting from a sedentary position, should note that I made a distinction between those two activities. I agree with the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) that it would be difficult to reply to the debate without having done so.

Mr. Davies: The Minister singularly refused to say whether, when he knew that he would be replying to the debate, he took the opportunity of going to Spitalfields to examine the position, to talk to the residents and to make his own assessment of the impact of the Bill on the people. He made no mention at all in his speech of the consequences of the move on the people of Spitalfields.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Davies: I will give way to my hon. Friend, but I know that my hon. Friends who represent the three Newham constituencies are anxious to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to conclude my remarks quickly so that I may listen to their speeches. However, I shall give way because my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is very anxious about the matter.

Mr. Tony Banks: I certainly am very anxious, because we still have not heard anything about Stratford market. The Minister for fruit and veg has been at the Dispatch Box but he did not say a word about Stratford market. Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to say a few words about it.

Mr. Davies: As part of my preparation for the debate, I took it upon myself to contact my hon. Friend and he spent many hours briefing me. [Laughter.] It is a strange irony that it is a matter for mirth that an Opposition spokesman should seek to acquaint himself with the problems of individuals who are faced with such legislation. It is a pity that the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who can so something about it, did not consult my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West. If he had, he might have been wiser and had something to say at the Dispatch Box this evening.

I took it upon myself to consult my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West. I know that he is worried about the impact on his market. If he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will put his case. I know also that if he does not catch your eye, he will ensure that the interests of his market traders are brought to the fore in a forceful way.

The case for the people of Spitalfields has been put already by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West. From my visit to the area I gained the impression that this is a unique and distinctive community. It is struggling to survive, but it is capable of being viable if given a helping hand. If it is not helped, it could be destroyed.

I offer to the House three graphic but brief illustrations of my conclusions from my visit to Spitalfields. As my right hon. Friend mentioned, Herbert house is a block of residential maisonettes. It is a visible exhibition of poverty, squalor and overcrowding that I did not know existed in 1988. Representing one of the most deprived and depressed mining areas of south Wales, I was shocked to find that degree of squalor in this capital city. What made that squalor more obscene was that it was overshadowed by the Broadgate development, rising up and blocking out the skyline. It is a symbol of wealth and affluence next to an area of abject poverty. That Broadgate development represents a world of business, employment and high finance which could not be further away from the everyday experiences of the people who live in Herbert house, whose outlook is blocked by that expensive development. That visit illustrated to me what the Bill is all about.

I was told that I had to see Aldgate Barrs. I was told that it had been offered as planning gain for an earlier planning development. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West suggested that the local authority may have been conned into agreeing to that development. Aldgate Barrs was held up as a vision of what could be offered to a community if it co-operated with new planning developments. The community was told at the time that there would be new shops, new leisure facilities and new community facilities and that the community would benefit. The shops are there, the keep-fit centre is there and the theatre is there, but the shops, the theatre and the keep-fit centre are of no use to the people of Spitalfields. Those facilities are outside their experience.

The Aldgate Barrs centre is busy by day, full of yuppies going about their business and leisure activities, but it is empty at night. It is closed also at weekends when the community, if it is to enjoy the benefit of planning gain, should be playing hard. But when the Aldgate Barrs centre could be enjoyed by the community, the doors are shut. That is not enriching a community; that is giving to the community a perpetual reminder of what it does not have. That is the sad aspect of that development. That constant reminder of a different lifestyle which is not available to the people of Spitalfields makes us angry.

The final indignity displayed in Aldgate Barrs is an advertising sign—[Interruption.] It might be a matter of humour to Conservative Members, but I do not find it humorous, because the advertising sign says:

"Bring a touch of France to your patio."

It is advertising new patios for gardens—in Spitalfields.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): What is wrong with that?

Mr. Davies: I will tell the hon. Gentleman what is wrong with that. The people who are living in the area that that facility is supposed to be servicing are living in squalor.

There are 1,300 homeless families and 12,000 families on the housing waiting list. A total of 25 per cent. of the male population in Spitalfields is unemployed and the average wage of those in work is £110 a week. The hon. Member for Fylde asks what is wrong with telling them to bring a touch of France to their patio. He does not know what world he is living in.

Another example of conditions in the area can be found on the Chicksand estate. It is a multi-storey tenement of two-bedroom flats. Those flats are being sought by property speculators who are offering £75,000 a time. That is happening in a ward in a local authority area where very few people can afford to exercise the right to buy which was so grandly given to them by the Government. They are so poor that they have to stand by and see property speculators paying £75,000 for multi-storey tenement flats in an area with that level of poverty.

That shows the real issues involved in the Bill. It is not just about having nice hygienic conditions of freeze-drying for horticultural products. That is not the issue. If it was, the Minister would have said, "I am concerned with a strategy for the markets in London." He would have said, "I am trying to develop a plan to ensure that the markets of London are best located and best run." He did not do that. He offended the House by gratuitously ignoring the real issues to which I have referred.

We are not being asked to approve the renovation of a worn-out market; we are being asked to relocate it to allow the redevelopment of the site on which it is currently located. The motivation for the Bill comes not from the residents of Spitalfields but from those whose fingers are in the development pie. The losers, if the Bill is passed this evening and completes its stages unchanged, will be the people of Spitalfields. For those reasons, we cannot support the Bill as it stands.

9.32 pm

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I listened with care to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), the representative of Spitalfields, and the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon), the daughter of Spitalfields. If there is one thing about which there is agreement, it is that the Spitalfields site is fairly scruffy and could well do with a facelift, a move or whatever. I do not think that there is any dispute between us on that.

I have no objection to the removal of the market and the building of a new market elsewhere, as long as the result is a market system that provides fair competition for the markets in London.

My interest in the Bill and the reason why my name is one of those appended to a motion blocking the Bill is that I represent the constituency of Battersea, within which is the bulk of Covent Garden market. In fact, a small part of it is outside my area and when I go into the flower market and walk beyond an imaginary line I find myself trespassing on the patch of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland). That is where the market starts to have its rates doubled.

The problem I wish to raise has been put to me by the Covent Garden market tenants association, the traders and the employees of both the market and the traders, many of whom live in my constituency. It is a problem about which concern has been properly expressed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) for referring to the fact that there has been considerable work between the City of London corporation and Covent Garden and active participation by my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) in an attempt to find solutions to the problem. As my right hon. Friend the Minister said, it is a pity that some people do not seem to have gone out of their way to look for solutions to the problems involved in the Bill.

The problem centres on the capacity of London markets. Unlike any other western capital, London has a chequered history in that a lot of markets have been formed. Every other capital city in western Europe has a single wholesale horticultural market. We have not one, but five, plus the small market, albeit largely retail, at Greenwich. We need to examine the danger of overcapacity. That is why we have not allowed the Bill to go through unopposed. We feel that market capacity should be examined carefully to ensure that the new market will not have adverse repercussions on the traders, markets or consumers of London.

The traders and employees at Covent Garden put three specific points to the corporation. First, they said that there should be a survey to establish the impact of the new market. I do not suggest for one minute that the wholesale markets have become inefficient. I am merely saying that trading patterns have changed. Whereas people used to go to their greengrocer for virtually all their fruit and vegetables, they now go increasingly to supermarkets. The supermarkets, in turn, go to their own wholesalers and many of them import direct. When considering investment in new markets, we need to ensure that we take that on board.

It was sensible to call for a survey to establish the need. There have been two reports—the O'Cathain report of 1981 and the Wells report of 1985. The O'Cathain report recommended a planned reduction in the number of markets. The Wells report recommended that Spitalfields market should be closed and that the City corporation should join with the tenants at Stratford in building a "modest yet modern market". It is a modest yet modern market that we have sought. It was and is important to have a survey and I hope that it will be carried out during the passage of the Bill.

The second point that the Covent Garden traders made to the corporation concerned the size of the market. People have justifiably wanted to ensure that the market is large enough to accommodate the existing traders from Spitalfields and Stratford if they want to transfer but not so large as to tempt market traders from other markets. To some extent, we have achieved that in our discussions and I welcome the assurance given by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate on the space needed and the pourboire—if that is the right word—to encourage existing traders to go. I hope that he will confirm that that will not be available to traders who trade at markets elsewhere. [Interruption.] I am glad to have that confirmed.

The third problem involves rents and rent increases. There was concern that if the rents were simply based on current rents that would take no account of the more attractive and extended facilities of the new market. Such rents could be considered to be some sort of subsidy to market traders in the new markets.

None of those apprehensions reflects on Covent Garden's viability. Covent Garden has been extremely successful since it was inaugurated. It has managed to conquer its massive debt repayments; the figure is now below £2 million and falling year by year. The space available at Covent Garden is well used and the gap that has been created by the use of supermarkets has been filled by other outlets for horticultural goods—not least distribution to the catering sector.

Although I was one of those who wished to block the Bill, I thank the City of London corporation and the Covent Garden market authority for their dedicated work in coming together to seek solutions. Tonight we have had, if not an eleventh hour solution, at least a seventh hour solution and have come to a substantial measure of agreement. Unfortunately, the City of London corporation has not agreed to the survey, but perhaps that will come later.

We have gained the reassurance that the new Spitalfields will be of a sufficient size, and sufficient only, to satisfy the needs of the Spitalfields and Stratford traders who move there. There is agreement that the space in the new market will take full account of the greater efficiency that can be achieved by modern market facilities and of the declining role of the wholesale market. The new Spitalfields will simply replace the old market. It will not result in overcapacity, which is a great danger for London wholesale markets.

We have been given some reassurance that the occupancy costs—rent and service charges—for tenants at the new market will be at least comparable to those of the Covent Garden market. Therefore, to a large extent, our worries about unfair enticements have been put at rest.

The City of London corporation has satisfied me and the people whom I represent at Nine Elms that its plans will not adversely affect the marketing at Covent Garden or the overall position of London markets. We can look forward, while the Bill is in Committee, to these reassurances being tightened, tidied up and brought back as a cast-iron guarantee to the market traders and employees of Covent Garden. It was right that I should have held out for the interests of my constituents. By holding out, consulting and negotiating, we have achieved for Covent Garden what other markets might have achieved had they done likewise. I have no doubt that we can formalise the agreement satisfactorily. I am happy to say that I shall not vote against the Bill.

9.42 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) said that he has been speaking for his constituents and the interests that he represents and that they have been satisfied. But the interests represented by my hon. Friends from Newham constituencies and I have not. Those are the interests of the London borough of Newham and the Stratford market traders, who are sorely affected by the proposal and who take a close interest in the proceedings of the House.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said, the Bill is not about market needs in east London. It is about the mega-millions of pounds involved in the redevelopment of Spitalfields. To use a catch word with which perhaps you are not familiar, Mr. Speaker, we are talking "loadsa" money here—but not "loadsa" money for the Stratford traders and certainly not for the people of Newham.

The Minister for food mountains, who was at the Dispatch Box a short while ago, could have addressed himself to the interests of market strategy in fruit and vegetables throughout London and east London in particular. But he chose not to. He made a few petty points about the Greater London council and sundry Labour-controlled councils in the east end of London.

I want to talk about the Stratford market traders and the position of the fruit and vegetable wholesale market in Newham. It has not suddenly appeared; it has its roots in a history going back to 1253, when Henry III granted Richard Montfitchet the right to hold a Tuesday market at West Ham and an annual fair from 19 to 22 July. The market developed gradually, but history is silent about it during the intervening centuries.

I notice that Conservative Members are being whipped in to vote in the interests of the City of London—the Chamber is suddenly quite full. Despite my legendary abilities to call people in to listen to my oratory, I know that that is not what they have come for. They would not be here on a Thursday night—they would all be getting their behinds out of this place as far as possible to look after their constituencies, as they should. But here they sit, waiting for a vote, knowing that they must stay here because they have been told to. That makes a mockery of the private Bill procedure.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South) rose——

Mr. Banks: I would have given way if the hon. Gentleman had been in the Chamber earlier; he should have come to listen to the arguments.

The real history of Stratford market dates from 1879. As London spread out and Stratford became a busy commercial centre that was increasingly inadequate to supply the needs of an ever-growing population, a market was established in 1879 which we would all recognise today as Stratford market. That market is now threatened by the Bill, and this is the first time that that has been raised during the debate.

The Stratford wholesale fruit and vegetable market occupies a site of about 6·25 acres of land—and buildings—that was originally owned by the Great Eastern Railway 100 years ago. It is now the property of the British Railways Board. It has an overspill in Burford road in which a number of market traders occupy premises and trade under the auspices of Stratford market. In 1985 the British Railways Board granted a 125-year lease on those acres of land to the new Stratford market development company formed by the traders, the majority of whom are now acting as their own market authority. Access to the market is via Burford road to the north and Abbey road to the south. So there is more than one access point, and I correct the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) on that point.

The constituency office of Newham, North-West is at the end of Burford road so I can look out of my office window and see what is going on in the market——

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I specifically said that there was more than one exit at Stratford market. I saw it yesterday afternoon, and the building to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Banks: I accept the hon. Gentleman's correction of what I said. He also said that much of the land around Stratford market was polluted by the gas board. I am assured that such a technical problem can be easily overcome with large quantities of concrete. They managed to do it at Chernobyl, so I am sure they can do it in Stratford.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate also mentioned access roads. I know that he has been in the area and had a look at it. Newham borough council has many good plans for developing the infrastructure in the area if the Spitalfields market could be transferred to Newham. About 40 acres of land in Stratford could be used to relocate Spitalfields market. Conservative Members will realise that there is a difference between the point of view of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, who is representing the interests of Stepney, and that of the hon. Members who represent Newham.

We would be delighted to have Spitalfields market in the London borough of Newham. We want that development in the London borough of Newham. We are not trying to oppose it. We want it in Stratford. But that is not the proposal. The proposal is that it will be in Temple Mills, which will have a deleterious effect on the Stratford market. We still have not received the assurances that we want from the promoters that they will look after the interests of the Stratford market traders.

The British Railways Board has played a fairly low role in all this. Not only did it give a 125-year lease to the Stratford market traders; it then sold a site in Temple Mills to rival developers for a new market. Frankly, it has been playing both ends off against the middle. The people who will now lose out badly look like being those in the London borough of Newham and the Stratford market traders.

The Stratford market traders have done their best to develop the site and to look to the future in terms of what we want there. The draft plan that was prepared in the 1980s concluded with the statement:

"It is the intention of the Stratford Market Development Company to take steady but progressive steps towards improving the basic ideals set out whilst at the same time preserving the interests of the tenants currently domiciled in the market, ensuring that upheaval is kept to a minimum. The complex is well situated in an area close to the main road routes and those envisaged in the future. With the co-operation of all concerned, it is felt that there is considerable potential for the market to develop and generate trade, providing additional employment with a greatly improved working environment."

There were plans, and those plans are still there, to try to develop the Stratford market area within a catchment area of some 3 million consumers.

As I have said, the opposition to the Bill comes from the London borough of Newham, which is extremely worried about the corporation's proposals in the Bill to close the present Spitalfields market and relocate it at Temple Mills, only 1·3 miles from Stratford market, causing severe disturbance to the existing Stratford market.

I have mentioned to the Minister that the London borough of Newham attempted to have the proposal called in by the Department of the Environment, but that was met with a blank refusal. We oppose the development and have tried to do so, but have had no co-operation from the City of London or the Department of the Environment.

The council feels that if the Bill is passed it will cause unemployment and hardship for some of those whom the council and my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) represent. The Bill will prevent the development of an expanded market at Stratford on a wider area of some 36 acres, of which the present market forms a part. That is larger than the Temple Mills acreage that is proposed for the new Spitalfields market.

The council contends that the corporation's proposals take no account of the existing market provisions on the eastern side of London. The provision of wholesale fruit and vegetable markets in east London is a complex matter and should be seen in the historical context of its various aspects. The Department of the Environment commenced a study in 1981. The Minister of State was not there at the time, but the report's recommendations have never seriously been considered by his Department, nor have they been considered by the City of London.

By the early 1970s the new Covent Garden market was established at Nine Elms, and, more recently, the western international market has been built at Heston to serve the western side of London. Conservative Members may find this vaguely amusing or vaguely boring. I make no apologies on this occasion for boring the House because I am boring the House in the interests of 300 employees at Stratford market and 25 traders who I know are paying close attention to what is going on in the House. I do not think that they have been very impressed by what they have seen on the Conservative Benches tonight, and that is from a party that is supposed to be looking after the interests of small traders.

Mr. Jack: Why, if he is so interested in the Stratford market employees, does the hon. Gentleman seek to deny them the chance of entering a modern horticultural market that could further develop their opportunities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not bored, but others among the hon. Gentleman's colleagues wish to speak. Will he bear that in mind?

Mr. Banks: I am delighted to hear that I am not boring you, Mr. Speaker. That is the last thing I would want to do. But I must respond to the hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack). Why does he not consult the market traders? Why does he think that they want to go to Temple Mills? He knows that they do not want to go—or I hope that he knows. They want to stay where they are. They want the new Spitalfields market—if there is to be one—based where they are at the moment. If they are forced to move to Temple Mills because their market will not be viable if the Temple Mills market is established, it will undoubtedly mean the loss of their trading position, and of many jobs in the area.

Mr. Spearing: Does not my hon. Friend find it rather strange that Conservative Members should self-confessedly be bored by an important exposition of the interests of Stratford market traders? Is it not probable—indeed, we can assume by their presence that it is obligatory—that Conservative Members are here only because of their concern with the interests of Spitalfield market traders? Would it not be natural for them to be interested also in the market concerns of Stratford—unless, of course, there is some other reason that they have not expressed?

Mr. Banks: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I know the City of London of old. Conservative Members have undoubtedly done their work. They are probably sitting there full of City of London champagne. They have probably been guzzling vast quantities of caviare. They would not be here at 9.56 on a Thursday evening if they had not all been bribed in some way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Members of the House are not bribed. The hon. Gentleman must withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Banks: A more honest group of people I have never contemplated, Mr. Speaker. I should have said that they had been induced in some way to come and show their fascination with market strategy and market traders in the east end of London. But I take the point, Mr. Speaker. I know that many Opposition Members want to speak.

We oppose the Bill. Effectively, it will mean the end of Stratford market. It will mean a loss of jobs and facilities, not only for the traders but for the London borough of Newham. On those grounds—and there are many more that I wish I had the opportunity to enunciate—I am against the Bill. Having said those few words, and in the hope that I have not bored the House, I shall sit down.

9.57 pm

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): I preface my remarks by saying what a shame it is that, of the two hon. Members representing the London borough of Waltham Forest, I have just been called but the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) has not yet been called.

I welcome the contribution that the new market will make to the London borough of Waltham Forest and to the local economy. In planning terms, the Bill will achieve two extremely useful purposes. It will make full and proper use of a site that appears almost purpose-made for the job at Temple Mills, and of the site of Spitalfields, which has clearly outgrown its present functions.

For those reasons, I welcome the Bill. I shall sit down in the hope that the hon. Member for Leyton may have half a minute in which to speak.

9.58 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): It is wonderful to have a minute and a half to represent the views of Leyton, where the market will go. [Interruption.] At least, it is proposed for it to go there. I do not think that I can do justice to the views of all the people of Leyton——

Torture and Inhuman Treatment

10.21 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I beg to move,

That the draft European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 12th April, be approved.

The order provides that the members of the European committee, to be established in accordance with article 1 of the convention for the prevention of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, shall enjoy the appropriate privileges and immunities to enable them to exercise their functions under the convention.

Torture is one of the gravest violations of human rights. The British Government have repeatediy condemned it at the United Nations and in other international forums. It is expressly prohibited by the universal declaration of human rights, the international covenant on civil and political rights, and the European convention on human rights. Allegations that states or their agents have resorted to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment are subject to investigation under the relevant international instruments.

In a recent years, two new initiatives have been taken by the international community to make more effective measures for prevention. The first is the United Nations convention against torture, which was laid before Parliament in August 1985. The Government intend to introduce amendments to the Criminal Justice Bill which will enable the United Kingdom to ratify that convention later this year.

The second initiative is the convention that is the subject of tonight's debate. The initiative for the convention came from the Assembly of the Council of Europe. As hon. Members will know, torture is prohibited by domestic laws in all countries in western Europe. The victims of torture or inhuman or degrading treatment have legal channels—both domestic and international—open to them to complain and to seek and obtain redress. But the assembly believed that something more was needed—something that would go towards preventing such acts. It therefore proposed a non-judicial system that monitored detention, with a view to discouraging treatment that amounted to a violation of human rights. The result is the convention.

Under the convention, a committee will be established. The task of the committee will be to arrange visits to places of detention in order, in the terms of article 1 of the convention, "to examine the treatment of persons deprived of their liberty with a view to strengthening, if necessary, the protection of such persons from torture and from inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

Parties are required to offer the members of the committee every facility in the performance of their tasks, in particular by giving them access at any time to any place where persons may be held—for instance, police stations, interrogation centres, prisons and hospitals—and the opportunity to interview detainees in private, and likewise their families, legal representatives and doctors.

Apart from periodic or routine visits in the territory of each contracting party, the committee may organise any ad hoc visits that it thinks warranted. After each visit the committee will communicate its findings and recommendations to the party concerned. That procedure is confidential. However, where the Government concerned fail to co-operate or refuse to comply with the recommendations, the committee may decide to make a public statement. If the relevant state itself requests publication of the committee's findings and recommendations, the committee is obliged to comply.

As officials in charge of places of detention do not know when they will receive a visit, they should be encouraged to fulfil their obligations towards detainees and to refrain from questionable practices. That non-judicial and confidential procedure is designed to assist Governments in treating detainees properly. It aims at co-operation between the committee and the state concerned and not the latter's conviction by a judicial authority.

The members of the committee are, according to the convention, to be elected by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe from a list of names drawn up by the bureau of the assembly. Members of the committee will serve in their individual capacity. The convention stipulates that they be picked on the basis of good character and experience in the human rights field. The committee may, if it wishes, appoint suitable experts to help it.

Much progress has been made in human rights in the last 20 years, but I think that everyone would say not yet enough. At the United Nations, particularly in the United Nations Commission of Human Rights, it has become harder for countries abusing the rights of their own citizens to escape the glare of international publicity and condemnation. Every year more problems are addressed and a closer examination is made of situations in which states have failed to live up to internationally agreed standards.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): Is it envisaged by the Government that during the visits that the committee will pay to various places there will be any change in the definitions that are currently accepted as constituting inhuman or degrading treatment? Or will the members of the committee be bound by the precedents set in judgments of the Court of Human Rights?

Mrs. Chalker: I believe that for the time being the committee would be bound by the judgments already set. But if there were a consistent pattern in what the committee was finding, I am sure that it would be both wished and sensible that there should be further examination. For the time being, however, I think that we had better let the committee get on with its work and see what is then produced. I am sure that no hon. Member would want anything that looked like a consistent pattern of seeking to evade the intention of the rules to be allowed to continue for any period. So that is certainly something that we should be looking at for the future.

In 1985 the commission appointed a special rapporteur on torture to investigate allegations of torture wherever they might arise. We have strongly supported his reappointment each year as another part of the international machinery designed to put an end to this horrific abuse. We also played an active part in preparing the United Nations convention against torture, which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1984 and which we signed in March 1985. Under that convention, which came into force last June, a committee of independent experts has been elected to examine periodic reports by states parties. Through the periodic reports which no doubt will come from the committee we can look at the experience of the next few years as it is revealed by the investigations.

I do not wish to detain the House, so let me just say one more thing. The European convention is another step—perhaps a small but an important step—in the right direction. It has been signed by all 21 member states of the Council of Europe. Three countries have already ratified it—Turkey, Malta and Ireland. Sweden, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) is interested, has not yet ratified it. I understand that Sweden will go through a similar procedure to this in its Parliament before it can rectify the convention.

The convention will serve as a signal to other regions of Europe's commitment to stamp out torture. Let us hope that it will lead eventually to the elimination throughout the world of this terrible violation of human dignity. We wish to do everything to prevent torture and such violations.

I am pleased to commend the convention and the Order in Council to the House.

10.30 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): I hope that the Minister is not too disappointed that she will not have her usual confrontation with my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). It has fallen to me to speak for the Opposition. I do not know whether it is inhuman treatment or punishment for a Scots Member to be asked to do this late on a Thursday night. Sometimes I feel it is, as no doubt does the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), the name of whose party I still have difficulty remembering.

We welcome the order, the convention and the committee—all described as a radical step in the crusade against torture in one of the commentaries on the matter. On behalf of the Opposition, I pay tribute to the work of Amnesty International and the pressure that it exerted for the setting up of the committee and the whole campaign that it has been running on torture. I also add a word of thanks to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) who, over a long period, has played a great part, particularly when he was chairman of Amnesty International in the early 1970s.

We approve of giving diplomatic protection and immunity from arrest and prosecution to the members of the committee who are undertaking an important task. It is always easy to say that we disapprove of torture, which the right hon. Lady rightly described as a calculated attack on human dignity and one of the worst indignities that we see. It is not enough to condemn; we have to back up the words of condemnation with action. Action to eliminate torture is particularly important when we read in the Amnesty International report that about one third of all countries recorded instances of torture in the 1980s. Those are not old records—but in this decade. So we have a long way to go. United Nations and European actions are vital.

Incidentally, it would be useful if the right hon. Lady, in her final words, could confirm the report which was in the Daily Telegraph of 25 November last year about the United Nations convention. It said:

"If the convention's provisions are made retrospective . . . it could form the basis for war crimes trials in Britain."

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not stray too far from the motion.

Mr. Foulkes: I shall endeavour not to do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it would be helpful, as the right hon. Lady mentioned the United Nations convention in her remarks, if she could clarify that.

As the Minister said, we have a European responsibility to eliminate torture in the 21 member states of the Council of Europe, and we can act as an example to other regions of the world. That is something that Opposition Members fully endorse.

Even in 1988, there have been allegations of torture in four member states of the Council of Europe—here in the United Kingdom, in Spain, in Italy and, above all, there have been numerous allegations of torture taking place in Turkey. It is peculiar, and, strangely enough, disturbing, that Turkey should be the first state to ratify this convention. It does seem paradoxical and strange—[Interruption] I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for Industry would find it strange if he paid attention to the debate. The allegations relating to Turkey are serious.

I find it disturbing because, as I understand it—perhaps the Minister will confirm this—the first seven countries to ratify set things in motion. Therefore, if the first seven countries——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that once we start discussing torture in the individual countries, the debate will be wide open and interminable. We are discussing the granting of immunities and privileges to those who are monitoring these things.

Mr. Foulkes: I appreciate that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the right hon. Lady covered instances of torture in particular countries. When we are talking about the way that the monitoring takes place and the procedures and the immunities that are to be granted, what is happening in individual countries is relevant. Unless we see the order in its proper and wider context, this discussion will become technical and sterile.

The important matter that we should take into account is that the first seven countries have the responsibility of setting up the committee and its operational aspects, including its immunities and privileges.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not debating all those things tonight; we are debating immunities and privileges.

Mr. Foulkes: But these are the kind of things that these seven countries will have responsibility for. If those countries are the worst offenders in relation to human rights, the operation of the committee will be hampered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Be that as it may, it is not a matter for debate before the House tonight.

Mr. Foulkes: I appreciate that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was merely picking up some of the matters that were raised by the Minister in her speech. If it is in order for the Minister to raise those matters, presumably it is in order for other hon. Members to raise them.

We appreciate the importance of all aspects of this convention, including the immunities and privileges which have been granted to the members of the committee. It is a unique committee and, because it is unique, it is important that it is given immunities and privileges which are not granted to many other operational committees. It will provide a sophisticated surveillance system and act, as the Minister said, as a preventative device. It will be a deterrent to human rights violations.

It is important to have some guarantee that the committee will be independent and that the members will not become the servants of the states from which they come. I hope that when the Minister considers this matter further, she will make sure at the Council of Europe that the method of appointment of committee members will ensure that they act independently. If not, the kind of privileges that we are considering and granting to them tonight will not be appropriate.

The Minister said that the members of the committee should be of good character. She did not quote the exact words of the convention on the arrangements for setting up the committee, which are that they should be of high moral character. Whatever the difference between "good" and "high moral" character, we believe that they should be of high moral character. We also believe that they should have some support and have independent access to funds —not just from Governments but from the Council of Europe—so that they can operate fully and independently.

We welcome the powers given to the committee members—which justify the granting of immunities and privileges—to interview any persons in private with unlimited access; right of access to all places of detention; and the power to produce and, if two thirds of the committee agree, to publish, reports.

However, the Minister will appreciate that we are concerned about some of the restrictions. The Minister said that no advance notice should be given. My understanding is that advance notice must be given to the states concerned, if not to the individual detention centres. Such restrictions will reduce the committee's effectiveness.

States are also given the right to postpone visits in the interests of safeguarding national defence and public safety; where serious disorder is occurring in detention centres; and especially where visits might prejudice interrogations relating to serious crime. That limitation on the committee's operations is the one about which the Opposition have the gravest doubts, because all Amnesty International's reports show that the most serious instances of torture occur during interrogation. When we ratify the convention and participate in the setting up of the committee, I hope that the Minister and our representatives will ensure that the derogations, limitations and restrictions on the committee are minimised as much as possible.

I am concerned that when we are giving immunities and privileges to the Committee to operate in a way of which we strongly approve, an exhibition of torture instruments produced in the United Kingdom should have been held in London at the Barbican centre. That was sad, and a matter which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) raised several times in questions and on the Floor of the House. I hope that the Minister will give some assurance that we are not encouraging the maufacture and export of torture equipment from this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Again, I remind the hon. Gentleman that such matters have nothing to do with the instrument that is before the House. I hope that he will now address himself to the instrument that is before the House.

Mr. Foulkes: When we make the important decision to grant immunities and privileges, we are giving an important power to the recipients. Therefore, it is important to look at the matter in its wider context. However, as always, I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We should not be complacent about human rights, because we shall be subject to investigation and report by the committee. If people complain, committee members will arrive in this country and be able to travel free from any kind of arrest, prosecution or legal procedures, with the diplomatic immunities and privileges of a head of mission. It is likely that we shall have to look carefully at our interrogation procedures in police stations, at the condition of remand prisoners and of patients in some of our mental establishments. Otherwise we shall be subject to referral to the committee.

Finally, it would be helpful if the Minister could give some idea of the timetable for the ratification of the convention and the establishment of the committee. It would also help the House if the Minister could say whether the convention extends to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, or to Gibraltar, one of our overseas dependent territories in the European Community.

May we also have an assurance that information about the committee will be sent to prison governors, visiting committees and others who may have some responsibility for working with the committee when it comes into operation?

We welcome the Council of Europe's initiative in this matter and we welcome this instrument. We shall watch carefully the implementation of the committee's activities to ensure that actions match words. I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for your usual kindness and tolerance towards me.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): I wish to explore the narrow but important question whether the members of the committee will have the ability to assess the mental condition of prisoners. Apart from knowledge of human rights issues, the committee, when dealing with people who may be disoriented in some way, will need at its disposal people with psychological or psychiatric expertise.

I say that because solitary confinement over an extended time can be a form of torture. Indeed, it can be as uncivilised as more direct forms of torture. It is alleged by countries which pursue solitary confinement procedures that there is justification for such action. But where the motive is to wear a prisoner down to obtain a confession, perhaps by starving him of company, by giving or withholding visits and privileges and perhaps even by manipulating his diet, then a confession obtained or information extracted by such means—or punishment without trial—should certainly fall within the definition——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member heard me reproach the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), and I hope he will bear in mind what I said.

Mr. Gorst: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but to argue for certain privileges and immunities, I must explain the qualifications I have in mind. For a prisoner who is disoriented as the result not of blows or the use of sharp instruments but of a different sort of treatment, a certain type of qualification is required to enable that prisoner to be interviewed. Will the Minister say the extent to which other countries which hold people for unacceptably long periods in solitary confinement——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must again draw the attention of the House to the fact that we are debating the conferring of immunities on those who would carry out this work. We are not debating the kind of work that they would or should carry out. It is simply a question whether we should approve conferring immunities on them, and I hope hon. Members will address that point.

Mr. Gorst: I am simply arguing, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the fact that certain countries will sign this convention while others will not makes a mockery of any decision by us to approve this instrument. Sweden, for example, has not signed it. Has Switzerland signed it? We must discuss some of the matters that I am endeavouring to raise because some countries that have not signed are among the worst offenders in holding people in solitary confinement.

There are prisons in Sweden—for example, the Kronoberg remand prison—where prisoners will even——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Member to proceed further along these lines. I hope that he will not persist.

Mr. Gorst: Perhaps I have tried your patience a bit, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall conclude.

One must not make prejudgments, but I hope that the measure will have the universal support, not only of the House but of nations throughout Europe, because it deserves to be a further step forward in the humane treatment of prisoners. We live in a hypocritical world in which some of those with the most progressive reputations employ some of the most regressive means to achieve their ends. If this measure humanises anyone anywhere, it will fully justify the endeavours of the late Jean-Jacques Gautier, who is credited with being among those who gave inspiration to it. I hope that the House will pass the motion.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Like other hon. Members, I welcome the motion and the convention to which it relates. It is notable that the explanatory note, which is described as not being part of the order, points out that the order confers certain immunities and goes on to say:

> "It will enable Her Majesty's Government to become a party to the European Convention on the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, done at Strasbourg on 26th November 1987."

It is clear that the order will have a direct and important consequence and hon. Members have directed their attention to that.

How far are these immunities justified? Those who are elected to the committee will have the power to visit any place where people are deprived of their liberty, the power to interview those in custody and the right to make recommendations to improve the protection of those who are thus detained. Those are considerable powers and responsibilities and it is not difficult to conclude that the greater the power invested in the committee, the greater the need for the committee to be possessed of immunity.

Is such immunity justified in relation to the quality of the people who are to be elected to the committee? They are to be of high moral character—that does not, of itself, necessarily justify immunity—and are to be known for their competence in human rights matters, to serve in an individual capacity, to be independent and impartial, to have the power to visit in time of peace or war and to visit all categories of those detained. If people of that quality are invested with those powers it is justifiable to argue that they are entitled to immunities on the scale that the order confers upon them.

The convention is, as the Minister said, but one further step in the attempt to eliminate torture and degrading punishment, in so far as that is within our power.

We cannot ignore the fact that those upon whom these immunities are conferred will be encouraged to exercise their responsibilities. We may look forward to the members of the committee visiting the prisons on mainland Britain, and perhaps also those in Northern Ireland. That will mean that these immunities can be used in a practical way to cause our institutions to come under considerable scrutiny. It is to be hoped that that scrutiny will not find us wanting, either in the management of the institutions or in the treatment of those who are necessarily detained in them.

The convention is a step in the unremitting battle against torture, about which some statistical information has been given to the House.

I conclude by joining other hon. Members who have asked the Government how soon they are likely to ratify the convention. If the order's purpose is to enable the Government to become a party to the convention, it is in the interests of the House to know how soon that enabling power will be exercised. Certain requirements must be met before the convention becomes applicable, and the sooner the Government ratify it, the sooner others may be encouraged to do so.

I welcome the order because I welcome the convention that it is designed to enable the Government to become a party to. That convention has a desirable purpose that hon. Members will not find it difficult to embrace.

10.57 pm

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I welcome the order and the establishment of the committee. Torture is not only illegal but, as my right hon. Friend the Minister said, an abomination. It still goes on in sometimes subtle forms in Europe. There is, for example, the use of solitary confinement. The case of Captain Hayward in Sweden is one that comes to mind——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought the hon. Gentleman was listening earlier when I had occasion to remind the House that we were not discussing such matters. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not pursue them.

Mr. Browne: I was just beginning my introduction about torture——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Introductions can be just as much out of order as perorations.

Mr. Browne: I accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I welcome the order and the establishment of the committee. I particularly support the establishment of the spot-check visits. In a light vein, I ask my right hon. Friend whether the Whips' Office will be open to inspection. In more serious vein, I ask about the limitations on the committee's activities during interrogations about serious crimes. I agree with the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) that serious questions are raised. Those are just the times when the sort of torture that we are trying to combat most readily occurs. We must increase the coverage of spot checks.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if interrogations are the times when the greatest scrutiny is required, they may well be the times when the committee must flex its muscles and show its powers? Are not those the times when its immunities will be all the more valuable to it?

Mr. Browne: When ratifying the convention, the Government must seriously examine the possibility of increasing these powers. This limitation on them must be re-examined, too. I agree with inviolability in respect of documents and papers.

Will my right hon. Friend ensure that interviews with selected subjects on visits will be carried out free from official host Government eavesdropping, particularly in the form of tape recordings and other electronic devices? That is a violation of what the committee is all about. Will she assure the House that private interviews will be really private, even in an electronic age?

I congratulate the Government on keeping the initiative going and supporting it with an order and the establishment of a committee which I and most people, if not all, entirely support.

Mrs. Chalker: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thank hon. Members for their contributions to this short debate. I have listened with interest to some of the useful points made. There were a number of specific questions, some of which do not fall within the order, and I shall write to hon. Members to clarify those points.

I can tell the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) that I think that the Committee is being set up in the right way. He asked a series of questions about powers and delays that might be promoted by the state under investigation. If that is to be the case, that matter will be alighted on immediately by the Assembly of the Council of Europe. I am sure that such matters would not continue for more than a short time.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of what was to him the peculiarity that Turkey had not only signed the convention on 11 January 1988 but that its national assembly ratified the convention of 25 February and was the first Parliament of the Council of Europe's state members to do so. That is an encouraging development. It is early days, but I believe that Turkey is seeking to put behind it many of the things that we believe to have happened in the past which it now says it wishes to cease.

I am sure that many elected in the recent elections in Turkey are determined to honour the provisions of the convention on the prevention of torture and certainly the inspection on demand of police and prison facilities by the committee is welcome.

Progress is beginning to be made, but I agree that much needs to happen. I would not quarrel with the hon. Gentleman on that. But Turkey has completed procedures to ensure the effective implementation of article 3 of the convention on human rights and that progress was reported more than a year ago now in the Council of Europe when the Commission of Human Rights reported.

Turkey has also said that it accepts the rights of individual petition to the Commission of Human Rights, although it has expressed some reservations. There are many other signs of progress in Turkey. We must do all we can, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did on her visit to Ankara, to ensure full respect for human rights in Turkey, as every Government must do in their own country.

The hon. Gentleman went on to ask me about the timetable for ratification. Three member states have already signed and ratified. We are coming before the House tonight and will go to another place, I believe next week, to ask for its agreement to the ratification of the order. That leaves three member states who have still to ratify the convention. I cannot say exactly when that will be, but I am sure that it will be within months, and then the convention will come into force. It can do so, as I think the hon. Gentleman is aware, once seven member states have ratified the convention. Then the committee will be set up.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions about the export of instruments of torture. I think that it would be sensible for me to write to him about that. He also asked a specific question about dependent territories: would they be part of the process? They have the option, which I sincerely hope that they will all take up, of having the convention extended to them. The hon. Gentleman and the House will be glad to know that the Isle of Man and Jersey have already said that they will be doing so. We are waiting to hear from Guernsey, and Gibraltar is also being approached. In that sense, the convention will have an even wider scope than the hon. Gentleman may have thought.

The hon. Gentleman asked about information being given to prison governors and others that the committee had been set up. That is really a question for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, but what the hon. Gentleman said on this occasion seemed good, sound common sense, and I hope that we shall be able to meet the intention that lay behind his remarks.

I think that I have covered all the relevant questions that the hon. Gentleman asked. I believe, however, that we should probe how the committee will work and for that reason the questions asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) were also interesting. My hon. Friend will find that the mental condition of persons detained is covered in article 7 of the convention, which stipulates that the committee may appoint any expert whom it needs for particular visits. That expert will have the same immunity as committee members while working with them on a case. In that and perhaps other circumstances, I believe that my hon. Friend's anxieties are fully met.

My hon. Friend went on to speak of the use by some countries of solitary confinement. Obviously, I cannot speak for all countries, but the general intention expressed by members of the Assembly of the Council of Europe leads me to believe that if there are arrangements for solitary confinement in any of the states that will be party to the convention they will ensure, as we do, that they do not constitute torture, or inhuman or degrading treatment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) was concerned about the privacy of interviews. Article 8 of the convention lays down that interviews must be in private, and access by the committee must be without restriction and unlimited. My hon. Friend's fear that it might be fixed is already well covered by the convention, which requires that the actions of the committee shall be without limit in the sense of the pursuance of the articles. There are many ways in which hon. Members sometimes find their privacy threatened, but if they try to have nothing to hide, they will find themselves in much better order.

It would be easy to reiterate some of the points on which we all feel extremely strongly. The ratification of the United Nations convention against torture later this year is another way in which we will be marking the 40th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights.

The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) asked about another case. I shall be writing to him about that, but we seek to follow the principle that I have enunciated in this and in my opening speech. We must go on ensuring that the right procedures are in place to follow up the anxieties which, rightly, are readily expressed in the House and in many other Parliaments when Governments exceed what is right, sensible and reasonable in pursuing affairs of state and the security of the state.

As I have said, the last 20 years have seen much progress in the protection of human rights. We must maintain the momentum that we have achieved; we must ensure that the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms is really safeguarded. The order, and the convention to which it relates, mark further progress.

I think I have said quite enough for tonight and therefore, once more, I commend the order to the House. I hope that it will be ratified as soon as possible after it has been considered in another place. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) asked about that. I repeat that we wish to give the order all speed. We wish to see it in force.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 12th April, be approved.

PETITION

Murder

11.10 pm

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I seek leave to present a petition from several thousand people of the west midlands and mid-Worcestershire who are particularly concerned about the recent killings of children in the area and the sixfold increase in murders since capital punishment was abolished.

The petition states:

The Humble Petition of Wyre Forest constituents and friends sheweth that in the United Kingdom there has recently been an unacceptable increase in the taking of life of innocent victims.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House restores capital punishment for the taking of life of innocent victims.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Rover Group

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

11.11 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) had intended to be here and we had arranged with the Minister that he would also make a contribution to the debate. Unfortunately, his wife, Ina, has gone into hospital today for an operation and he cannot be with us.

This short debate is a continuation of the debate that began last Thursday on the privatisation of Rover. For the Minister's information, it is also a prelude to the further debate that we shall have on Rover after which I hope we shall have the opportunity to oppose the shabby deal in a Division.

As The Guardian put it, if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, wanted to buy a Rover 800 it would set you back about £12,000. If you took the rest of the company as well you would get it for nothing and the Government would throw in £650 million and extinguish most of your debts.

About a year ago The Economist produced a pamphlet that cost about £90 entitled,

"The United Kingdom as a tax haven."

Clearly it did not have in mind Government bribes of such a scale as the one for Rover. Frankly, the deal stinks. It is a massive theft of working people's money. It is the industrial equivalent of the Tory Westminster council's 5p cemeteries. The Financial Times, hardly a Militant newspaper, stated:

"British Aerospace is making off with United Kingdom taxpayers' money on a scale which makes the Great Train Robbery look like loose change."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said in the debate last Thursday, the role of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit)—the ex-Tory party chairman—has never been satisfactorily explained. In last week's debate it is instructive to note that, according to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, British Aerospace first approached Rover and then the Government. I refuse to believe that the right hon. Member for Chingford had no part to play in those exchanges.

Thirteen years ago, Rover, then British Leyland, had to be rescued by the Labour Government because it had failed under private ownership and become virtually bankrupt after four years of Tory Government. Its book asset value on collapse, with numerous plants and hundreds of thousands of workers directly and indirectly dependent upon the success of the company, was less than the London office block Centre Point.

After those 13 years and £2,900 million of public investment, the company is now back in profit. For the Government, with so many of their Back Benchers opposed to public investment, the role of that money has been to finance the decline of a car industry that private investors would not properly support. Now that the company is just profitable, with pre-tax profits of £28 million, it will be not the taxpayer, who provided the cash, or the work force, which made sacrifices in jobs and working conditions, who will benefit, but the spivs and the speculators who will cream off the possible gains.

The problems of Leyland in private ownership stemmed essentially from the failure to invest. There are grave fears that in the years ahead, especially with the merger, the same problems could arise again. Immediately before nationalisation—if we want to be pedantic, when the Labour Government took over 99·7 per cent. of the shares—British Leyland was still paying dividends while desperately needed investment was being neglected. I remember a study that took place in the late 1970s of the assets per worker in the British car industry and the comparisons that were drawn with Germany and Japan. The study revealed that for every British car worker there was £7,000-worth of machinery, compared with £23,000 in Germany and £32,000 in Japan. The difference between Britain and Japan could be illustrated by giving one worker a spade and another a tractor, asking both to turn over fields and then berating the worker with the spade for taking two weeks to complete the task while congratulating the other with the tractor for finishing the job in two hours.

The result of that lack of investment, which was decided by management and approved by shareholders, who were raking in dividends, was that the British market share of British-owned car companies fell between 1968 and 1987 from 40·6 per cent. to 15·5 per cent. The blame for that fall was heaped on the backs of car workers by the press, management and Tory Members. However, the car workers never controlled and never managed. They never decided where the wealth that they had created was to be invested.

We were told last week that there was no alternative to the privatisation of Rover and the gift to BAe, but there is a Socialist alternative: first, total opposition to the privatisation of Rover; secondly, nationalisation of Ford, Vauxhall, Peugeot, Jaguar and Nissan, for example, to form an integrated, publicly owned car industry capable of matching the production levels of General Motors, Ford and Nissan on a world scale, with the workers in the driving seat.

On 4 May, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said:

"the board of Rover Group has always looked forward to the day when the businesses of the Rover Group could be returned to full private ownership."

A future Labour Government must ensure that the boards of public companies are staffed by those who are committed to full public ownership, management and control. That can be guaranteed only when a majority of seats on the boards are occupied by trade unionists from within the industry and the trade union movement generally. Nationalisation plus Lord Robens, Ian MacGregor and Sir Michael Edwardes has never equalled Socialism.

In the two months since the deal was first announced, and despite Tory Members' assertions last week to the contrary, doubts and fears have filled the minds of car and aerospace workers. They are apprehensive about the future, especially when it comes to continuity of employment. There has been no discussion or consultation with the trade unions, despite two letters, dated 1 March and 29 March, from Graham Day, the chairman and chief executive of Rover, each of which contained three or four paragraphs. I checked that yesterday and today with the conveners of two major plants. There have been no ballots on the proposals among the work force. Those Tory Members who spoke last week about the delight of workers at the takeover were making up those assertions.

There are no guarantees for jobs in this shabby deal. Last week the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said:

[Mr. Dave Nellist]

"were British Aerospace to decide for some reason to relinquish . . . any substantial part of the undertakings of those subsidiaries"—

the Rover subsidiaries—

"British Aerospace could be required to repay any net economic benefit."

When asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) to define "substantial", the right hon. and learned Gentleman replied:

"We have not defined that aspect in any substantial or quantified terms—it will be a matter of judgement at the time."

In the next column the right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

"we have not made the conditions inflexible. It is not necessarily the case that they will be insisted upon by the Government."

He added:

"Circumstances might arise in which British Aerospace wished to dispose of a subsidiary company. Therefore, we leave open the possibility that the Government might waive the condition. For the moment, British Aerospace has no intention of doing any of the things I have talked about". —[Official Report, 4 May 1988; Vol. 132, c. 930-33.]

I have quoted those passages at length so that there can be no misunderstanding by workers at Rover or BAe. I could have put it more simply by merely quoting the unelected Lord Young on Channel 4's "Business Programme" on 6 March. He said:

"We will not impose conditions about manufacture at Cowley or Longbridge."

Do workers look to BAe for confidence in the future? Since privatisation in 1980, BAe has axed 11,000 jobs and realised land assets in the south, notably at Weybridge and Hatfield. Since the announcement of this sale, BAe has said that one sixth of the dynamics division will go before 1990—3,000 jobs—and that a further one third of aircraft division jobs are to go before 1992. That is hardly very inspiring for midlands car workers.

BAe has to ask the Government for launch aid for aircraft each time it wishes to initiate a major project. Will BAe be capable of generating investment to keep Rover even in the second division of the European car league when, at the end of March, it had to set aside almost £400 million to cover the expected losses on civil aircraft orders as a result of the falling dollar?

Do car workers, or aircraft workers, look to Rover's management for job guarantees? Since 1977, Rover has systematically reduced its work force from 172,000 to 60,000. Thousands upon thousands of those redundancies were in Coventry. My city has suffered more, perhaps, than any other city from the collapse and decline of the car industry. The apparent strategy—I say "apparent" because Graham Day has abandoned it in the last two years—during that period was to increase the share of the market and to boost profitability by reducing wages and increasing production. From 1980 to 1987, the productivity of the British car industry increased by over 100 per cent. In 1977, each Rover worker produced 6·5 cars. Last year that figure had risen to 16. During those 10 years, four assembly plants and 13 components factories were closed, yet production is still not much more than half what it was in 1972.

In order further to control the increasingly exploited work force, Rover's management has sought to undermine the organisation of workers and their ability to defend themselves. [Interruption.] They have been ably abetted—apparently, judging by the laughter of the Government Whip and the Minister, with some enjoyment—by the panoply of anti-trade union legislation that has been enacted by this Administration.

The onslaught against shop floor organisation has involved victimisation—for example, of the conveners Derek Robinson at Longbridge, Ian Schofield at Solihull and my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East at Unipart. They were all sacked for carrying out their trade union responsibilities. [Interruption.] If the Minister wishes to intervene, he ought to investigate the facts surrounding the sacking of Derek Robinson. He will find that he was sacked because, as convener of shop stewards, [redacted]ut his name to a trade union document that argued for the expansion of the car industry and the protection of jobs. I remember that clearly, because I was working for a subsidiary of British Leyland at the time. It also involved Rover in using that insidious organisation, the Economic League, to blacklist good trade unionists—a practice that has now spread to other car firms, such as Peugeot-Talbot in Coventry.

Sir Michael Edwardes, the former BL chief, was appointed by a Labour Secretary of State and knighted by the Tory Government in 1979, within days of gaining office. But he is hardly unique. Last week the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster praised Graham Day, the current boss of Rover. Mr. Day was brought in to speed up privatisation; he was brought in as an undertaker disguised as a physiotherapist. While his knighthood might now be just a formality, for my money the man is a butcher. After he had been three years in charge of British Shipbuilders, the work force fell from 65,000 to 10,000. Since May 1986—[Interruption.] Again, the Minister and the Government Whip seem to find the poverty, the misery and the unhappiness that redundancy has brought to the families of workers who lost their jobs in the north-east and other areas due to the decline of British Shipbuilders extremely funny. That may well be something, with the luxury of ministerial and Whips' salaries, from which they can be insulated. Having come down from the north to this palace of varieties called Westminster, I view it from a different perspective.

Since May 1986, with only two years at the helm of Rover, Graham Day has sold 18 businesses. With privatisation, the Tories are now ransacking the rest of the cupboard to please their friends in big business. Mr. Day does not particularly care about jobs or producing goods. He said, in another direct quotation:

"We want to make money. People keep talking of market share, but the objective is to become profitable."

That is capitalism in a nutshell. It is not about making goods or safeguarding jobs; it is about making money. With Day and Smith in charge, profit will be king. The jobs of car or aerospace workers will come a very poor second.

All that would be true on the basis of the status quo; but the future of the car industry is tied up with the health or otherwise of the economy as a whole. With the onset of recession in the United States of America—and no doubt next Tuesday's trade figures from the United States will give further evidence of that—the world's largest car market will begin to contract. Companies like Jaguar and Range Rover, which export 50 to 60 per cent. of their output to the United States, will be particularly hard hit.

The rapidly falling dollar, which is both a cause and a symptom of the disease of American capitalism, is already causing them to feel the pinch.

In January this year, the West Midlands enterprise board produced a sector review on the motor vehicle and components industries. Quotations from that are illuminating.

"The world and European car industries are heading for a period of global over-capacity in which competition will intensify and some plants or parts of plants will face closure for two reasons; firstly, the build-up in Japanese capacity both in the US and increasingly in Europe, and secondly, the fact that most of the major manufacturers will be retooling and introducing new models at an accelerated rate in the next few years . . . Japanese companies will have the capacity in North America to produce 2·3 million cars annually by the early 1990s either independently or through joint ventures . . . Such is the capacity build-up in the US, along with the fall in the dollar, that Japanese exports to Europe from the US in the 1990s is becoming a possibility . . . implications of this are that European manufacturers will face increasing difficulty in exporting to North America."

A more recent article in The Independent by the industrial editor, Jonathan Davies, says:

"The Japanese motor industry is going through its worst year in recent memory. Of the seven leading manufacturers, only two, Toyota and Honda, are operating profitably—and they expect their profits to fall by at least a half in the current year. The others are faring worse. The reason is not hard to find. All the Japanese are struggling to live with the rapid appreciation of the yen over the last 18 months, which has wiped out most if not all of the profit on the 3·7 million cars which are exported . . . Yet nobody in the European or American car industries is rushing to gloat at the unusual spectacle of their Japanese counterparts running to the Government in Tokyo with appeals for help. For one thing, the outlook for their own performance this year is far from inspiring. Demand for cars looks certain to fall quite sharply from last year's record levels in Europe and the US, and competitive pressures from both domestic and foreign manufacturers will pare margins to the bone . . . the Japanese have been stepping up their investment in overseas car production. Nissan's decision to build its green field assembly plant in north east England is just one example of a trend towards overseas production which began in the US and has been replicated in most European countries."

The logic of that is that in the next two or three years, managements will continue, and most likely intensify, their attacks on workers and their organisations.

The recent speed-up of track speeds and the increased exploitation of car workers have led to two things. On the one hand they have led to increasing stress and strain, which I mentioned last week in an intervention. For example, 17 shop floor workers in a six-week period towards the end of last year at Jaguar in Coventry died either from stress-related diseases or from strokes. When I put that to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), he said:

"The facts speak for themselves. If they are to survive, the productivity and performance of companies must be of a high standard. The output of Jaguar is still nowhere near the level of some of the European factories, which seem to manage perfectly well. I cannot comment on the physical standards of shop stewards and employees." – [Official Report, 4 May 1988; Vol. 132, c. 949.].

That speaks volumes for the synthetic concern that we hear in this Chamber from Tories about health and safety in the industry.

The second point that has come from the increased exploitation of workers has been the return of militancy to the car industry. I refer to Ford, Land Rover, Vauxhall and Jaguar. Again, virtually the whole car industry has been involved in strikes and overtime bans, or has come close to them, as pressures of exploitation increase and workers take the opportunity—soon to disappear—of relatively full company order books.

In last week's debate, Tory Members hypocritically attacked the Transport and General Workers Union at Ford in Dundee for an alleged loss of jobs, yet, in the past seven years, the millionaire directors of Ford have presided over the cutting of 30,000 jobs in Britain. Their plans for Dundee included workers on half the wages of other Ford workers. They wanted to emulate Nissan, where it is not so much a one-union deal as a no-union deal. Fewer than 10 per cent. of the 1,400 workers are members of the AUEW. That was achieved by Nissan interviewing 30,000 workers for the original 500 jobs and weeding out any workers with a trade union history.

I shall finish with some questions that were not answered in last week's debate. Why were there no consultations with the trade unions in the car industry or in British Aerospace? Why was there no ballot of the workers to be affected by the merger? What is the future of Longbridge, Cowley and the existing Aerospace plants? Does the five-year guarantee cover all existing plants within BAe and Rover? Where will the new large-scale investment come from to continue producing volume cars? What guarantees exist for jobs? The Minister offered half an inch of hope in the last sentence of his contribution last week, when he said:

"We are exceedingly proud of the deal and more than content for it to be subjected to scrutiny when it is completed".—[Official Report, 4 May 1988; Vol. 132, c. 971.]

On 28 October last year, I asked his boss, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster,

"if he will introduce a comprehensive system of departmental monitoring of privatised concerns."

That is after the hundreds of jobs lost at Alvis after privatisation from Rover in Coventry, and after the 20 per cent. cut in jobs within six weeks of the privatisation of Self-Changing Gears from Rover in Coventry, and after the 80 per cent. cut in the original 3,000 work force of Coventry Climax after privatisation from Leyland in Coventry. The Chancellor of the Duchy gave me a nice, simple answer:

"No, Sir."—[Official Report, 28 October 1987: Vol. 121, c. 297.]

I hope that the Minister wins the battle in the Department and that monitoring takes place.

This deal stinks. The future for car workers, particularly with the chill winds of economic recession blowing across the Atlantic, is again looking bleak. If the deal goes through, trade unions in Rover and Aerospace will have to come together at shop steward level and build a stronger, combined organisation to resist the cuts that Day and Smith and the Government obviously have in mind.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): In the short time that he has left for me, I shall deal with some of the points that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) has raised. It is customary for the Minister, in replying to an Adjournment debate, to congratulate the hon. Member on securing the debate. I should not wish to depart from that fine tradition. The hon. Gentleman is to be congratulated on his achievement in bringing this subject to the attention of the House, but he will agree, for different reasons, that we have had an excessive focus on the subject. I suspect that many of those who are involved in considering the deal that has been the subject of interest and debate will learn from the Hansard columns as they will from the other comment that has been made about it.

You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown) will not be surprised to hear that I could not disagree more fundamentally with almost everything that the hon. Gentleman has said. I suspect that that will please him immensely, as he would be extremely worried if I were to agree with him. As he knows, on 4 May, I stated that I represent a constituency that saw the beginnings of Leyland Motors, which grew into what is now the Rover Group. I have a substantial constituency connection with British Aerospace. I have talked to the work force in my constituency and in surrounding areas. I know exactly what their view is and while of course one or two are worried about what will happen, the vast majority of those I have spoken to are entirely in favour of the deal.

A variety of people—for example, the component manufacturers, and even, in the hon. Gentleman's own constituency, the managing director of Parkside Garages—have taken up the matter with the hon. Gentleman. To his credit, he made it vehemently clear that he believed, as he said earlier, in a completely nationalised motor industry. I imagine that Mr. Davies, the chairman of the Austin Rover Midlands Region Dealer Association, was shocked even to his experienced core by the response that he got from the hon. Gentleman, in that he was not prepared to listen at all or to take account of those repesented by the dealer association.

I have sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), who, in the debate on 4 May, cautioned against over-exposure of the Rover Group's affairs in the House. I do not believe that it is in the interests of the group, which means its employees and the dealers to whom I have referred, to have its model strategy and investment plans exposed to sometimes gratuitous and necessarily only partly informed comment, to which it is often very difficult to respond without further breach of commercial confidentiality. For that reason, if for nothing else, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying in the second part of his speech that his concerns were with the motor industry generally. It is on this that in the short time left to me I want to speak.

I cannot add a great deal to what has already been said on this subject in the debate. The hon. Gentleman has intimated that he may have to pursue the matter further, and that is his privilege. I shall be happy to respond, because I have no fears over this deal which will be of benefit to a wide variety of people within the Rover Group and British Aerospace and to many constituents of my hon. Friends throughout the country.

I turn briefly to some of the companies whose fortunes are of interest to the hon. Gentleman and his constituents, and incidentally to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher), who, like me, is a Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry and never ceases to represent the interests of his constituents in a different but just as positive a manner as the hon. Gentleman.

I happen to think, as my hon. Friend does, that Jaguar, for example, is an outstanding example of a British company whose reputation for quality and performance is established worldwide. Since privatisation, sales records have repeatedly been broken; successful new models, such as the XJ6 and the convertible XJS, have been produced; productivity has risen spectacularly—threefold since the early 1980s; and employment has increased by many thousands. It would be hard to find a more telling instance of the general lesson that the route to the creation of secure jobs is the efficient production of the goods the world wants and is prepared to pay for.

Another outstanding success in a different part of the market has been Peugeot-Talbot's expanding operations at Ryton. Following the £30 million modernisation programme for the 309 model, Peugeot has invested a further £19 million in the 405, the 1988 European car of the year. Start-up of the 405 production has led to a second shift at the Ryton plant, creating some 1,400 new jobs. Both these excellent models, built at Ryton, have been produced not to supply the United Kingdom market alone but for export as well. Nearly 15,000 309s have already been exported, and many 405s will be built for the European market.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a number of questions that he wanted answered and believed, understandably, had not been dealt with from his point of view, since he did not participate greatly in our debate the other day. While, inevitably, I have not time to deal now seriously and at length with the points that he raised, I shall be more than happy, and will endeavour, to write to him to answer them. He raised them rather late in his speech and I feel that he deserves a detailed answer.

I believe, as do many people who understand the motor industry generally, that there has been a renaissance of the industry, which has come about because it has endeavoured to overcome the many problems that it has faced in recent years.

One of the reasons for that is the economic climate which the Government have created. Gone is the era when fine-tuned demand management made planning a nightmare. How could the motor industry, with its characteristic long lead times for development, find the confidence to invest in a climate of stop-go economics in which the industry itself was used as a key instrument to regulate demand and activity? The stability of the Government's overall economic policy has provided a welcome respite from this for the car industry, as for United Kingdom industry as a whole, and replaced it with the prospect of continuing growth, combined with low inflation. Second must be the transformation of industrial relations. The Government have contributed by erecting a proper legal framework, but the real contribution has come from management, with renewed freedom to manage, working together with employees who realise that there is a common purpose in seeing off foreign competition.

In my constituency, when I drove off the line the 50,000th Leyland truck, I was able to tell the work force that it had done a tremendous job, along with management, in the face of overwhelming difficulties to bring the company into the 1980s and 1990s. I am sure that hon. Gentleman will agree with me about the work force in the industry.

Although the hon. Gentleman is knowledgeable because of his experience in his constituency, I believe that his assessment of the solution is wrong, as are his conclusions. I hope that he, along with me and many of my hon. Friends who believe that much has been achieved although more still needs to be done to put the motor industry in a better position for the 1990s and the year 2000, will recognise that the hook on which he hung his speech—the Rover Group-British Aerospace deal—will be good for the industry, for his constituents and mine, and also for industry as a whole throughout the United Kingdom.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 13 May 1988

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Abortion (Amendment) Bill

9.35 am

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I beg to present a petition on behalf of my constituents in Billericay:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled, the humble Petition of UK Residents showeth that the Abortion (Amendment) Bill which proposes to reduce the upper limit of abortion will, if enacted, restrict women's choices, endanger their health and open the door to further attacks on the 1967 Abortion Act.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House do Vote against the Abortion (Amendment) Bill.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Rear Seat Belts by Children) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

REGULATION-MAKING POWERS

'In section 199, subsection (2A) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 (exercise of regulation—making powers and Parliamentary control thereover), leave out "section 33A" and insert sections 33A and 33C", and leave out "that section" and insert "those sections" wherever those words occur.'.—[Mr. Waller.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.36 am

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 1, in clause 1, page 1, line 7, after 'regulations' insert

'approved by affirmative procedure by both Houses'.

No. 2, in page 1, line 15, after 'regulations' insert

'approved by affirmative procedure by both Houses'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 30, after 'section,' insert

'approved by affirmative procedure by both Houses'.

No. 18, in page 2, line 3, at end insert—

'(2A) In section 199 of the 1972 Act (exercise of regulation-making powers and Parliamentary control)—

(a) In subsection (3) after "33A" there shall be inserted ", 33C"; and

(b) In subsection (4) for the words "or 33A" there shall be substituted the words ", 33A or 33C".'.

Mr. Waller: As there has been some speculation about the intention of my hon. Friends and I in the House today, I wish to make it clear immediately that my intention—I speak for myself only—is to address myself specifically to this Bill. It has been said that others are interested in other Bills today. I favour the Bill in the name of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and I am certainly sympathetic to the Bill in the name of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) that, whatever happens today, I shall certainly be anxious to ensure that I do everything in my power to promote the safety of children in cars. If his Bill achieves its Report stage and Third Reading today, I shall be happy to work with him and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport to ensure that it works as effectively as possible in the interests of all car occupants, particularly children.

The new clause relates to the Road Traffic Act 1972 and I shall explain precisely what it seeks to do. There are three provisions. First, when the Secretary of State proposes to make the first regulations for which this Bill makes provision he would be required to lay before each House of Parliament a statement explaining those proposals. Secondly, after that, a period of three months would have to ensue before the regulations were laid before Parliament. Thirdly, and equally important, the regulations would expire three years after they came into force unless their continuation in force had been approved by both Houses. Those provisions are similar to those which apply to the original seat belt regulations for drivers and front seat passengers. The two principal requirements are the explanatory statement and the need for regulations to be renewed once we have experienced them over three years.

It is vital to have a statement before regulations are laid before Parliament because essentially the Bill is to be regarded as a shell. The essence of the legislation—I do not think that hon. Members will disagree strongly with this—will be incorporated in the regulations that the Minister will lay before Parliament. I fear that the regulations may have to be more complex than they appear to be at present. It is important that the Minister explains his proposals before he puts them into practice.

It may be said that after regulations are laid before Parliament there is a period before they are passed, whether it be by the affirmative or negative procedure. I think that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) intends to speak about that. The problem is that when the House considers a statutory instrument it can pass it or reject it, but it cannot amend it. Given the complex nature of the regulations, the chances are that the Department may not get them right. In one respect at least, the legislation is defective at present because it does not provide for exemption certificates.

If there had not been an opportunity to amend the Bill, it could have passed into the law in a defective form or would have had to be withdrawn. There is provision to amend the Bill but not a statutory instrument, so an explanatory statement should be made.

If the regulations are laid without the House having an opportunity to examine the issues involved, the chances are that they will be defective. If the House had an opportunity to study a statement there would be a period of three months to make representations to my hon. Friend the Minister so that improvements could be made to the Bill. We all agree that it is important to get regulations and the legislation absolutely right.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): My hon. Friend has implied on more than one occasion that, at the current stage of thinking and development, this measure may have been defective when it was introduced. Would the procedure that my hon. Friend is outlining be adequate to deal with its possible shortcomings? Is he sufficiently unhappy with the regulations that he feels that what he is suggesting may not be enough to provide safeguards against the shortcomings that have been identified?

Mr. Waller: We are still at an early stage. We have had an opportunity to listen to the views of my hon. Friend the Minister. He has said that he must consider the exact form of the regulations and that he will listen to representations at this stage. There is a long way to go before we can begin to think about whether the regulations are right or wrong. There is no guarantee that when they are laid before the House we will have got them right. There should be a wider debate before the regulations are laid so that everybody can express their opinion.

9.45 am

If this legislation becomes law it will have benefited from the fact that it has been open to amendment. I hope that we shall pass amendments that will improve the legislation and make it more acceptable. The difficulty is that the legislation is drafted in very general terms and it is difficult to know the exact form that the regulations may take.

Mr. Forth: I must press my hon. Friend about this matter. He has said once or twice that we are in the early stages, which slightly puzzles me. We are in the late stages of the Bill, and if major reservations are being expressed we shall have to address them fully. I am slightly alarmed that my hon. Friend is suggesting that it is all over bar the shouting and that we may not have to look in considerable detail at this measure. Are we at the late or early stages?

Mr. Waller: The Bill will have to be considered in another place if it is passed. We are at a late stage of this legislation, but I must emphasise that the meat of the new rules will be in the form of regulations, and we are not at an early stage of the regulations. I am concerned to ensure that when the regulations are laid we have an opportunity to get them right.

I should like to consider some of the issues that would be included in an explanatory statement and which subsequently would have to be addressed by the regulations. I hope to show that we need a statement to get the regulations right. The first problem is one to which hon. Members favouring and opposing the Bill have referred. It arises when the number of children carried in the rear of a vehicle exceeds the number of seat belts fitted. One thinks of a large family with three or more children when there may be only two rear seat belts fitted to the car. What happens if it is not possible to provide restraining devices for all the children because there are not sufficient mounting points? An explanatory statement would have to address whether it would be more dangerous to put two children in seat belts, thus providing less space for the other children than they would have in other circumstances.

Many people have spoken of the school run and the way in which parents share the duty of taking children to and from school. There may be two adults in the front and three children in the rear of a medium or large motor car. The permutations are endless. If parents are to consider what it is best to do for their children, they must be given guidance on the permutations for placing children in restraining devices. We must not have legislation that does not address these matters.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Does my hon. Friend agree that the points that he is making were well covered on Second Reading? It was explained that the Bill does not in any way materially affect the number of children carried in the back of a car. It applies only to the number of seat belts fitted. The moral dilemma about which child should be restrained exists at present; it does not arise because of the existence of the Bill. My hon. Friend took part in the debate on Second Reading, and if he looks at Hansard he will see that the matter was well covered.

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend is over-simplifying the matter. On Second Reading and in Committee my hon. Friend the Minister addressed this problem quite carefully, although we have not voted on it at any stage or considered it in great detail. I do not want to labour the point, but I mentioned it as an issue that will have to be considered in the regulations and therefore should be considered in a statement before regulations are laid.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the evidence that appeared on Second Reading and in Committee and the evidence that led to the Bill being introduced showed that if a child is unrestrained in the back seat without a seat belt it is in danger? Does he not share the simplicity of my view that if it is dangerous for a child to be in the back of a car without a seat belt, it should not be in the back of the car and other arrangements should be made? It is very difficult to balance convenience with children's lives. Is it not inconsistent for the Bill to claim that children should wear seat belts in the rear of the car, but if there are more children than seat belts some children may be unrestrained?

Mr. Waller: The fitting of child restraints in the rear of cars is not compulsory. It is conceivable that people will have to carry children whom they do not normally carry in the car. I would not want to tell people that they should never carry children in the car whom they do not normally carry simply because there is no restraining device fitted for that child. That would be going too far and many people would regard that as an unreasonable demand.

The problem of the child who is not normally carried in the car is very important and should be addressed in the statement. Would it be necessary to install a seat belt rather than a child restraining device for a child who was too big or too small for a restraining device in the car? People need guidance on that.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster used to be a Transport Minister and referred to the dangers that might exist if children who were too small were placed in a seat belt normally used for larger children or adults. We cannot expect car users to carry with them all the pads, adaptors or other equipment necessary to make a normal seat belt suitable for a child of any size. Those issues must be dealt with in a statement.

Clause 1 refers to

"the description of seat belt to be worn by children of any prescribed description."

That is a very wide definition. Clause 1 gives considerable prescriptive power to Ministers and future Transport Ministers who, unlike my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport who has responsibility for roads and traffic, may not take such a reasonable attitude.

I have spoken to mothers over the past few days and I am aware that there is some difficulty in placing some children in a restraining device. Should there be an exception for short journeys of up to half a mile where the danger involved in causing distress to some children may exceed the safety benefit of putting them in a restraining device?

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): While the hon. Gentleman is referring to short journeys, has he given any thought to the problems that might arises with taxis? Unlike me, he had the benefit of being a member of the Standing Committee. I have taken it for granted that the Bill is all right. However, he is shaking my belief in that. Can he guide us about the problem with taxis?

Mr. Waller: In Committee the hon. Members for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) and for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) referred to the problem of taxis. I will deal with that in a moment because I believe that it is important.

Another issue which must be dealt with in some detail in an explanatory statement is the reasonable excuse provision incorporated in clause 1. Many people have given different views about what a reasonable excuse might constitute. It has been suggested that it might be a reasonable excuse for someone stopped by a policeman and told that he or she had a child in the rear of the car who was not belted in to reply that the child had undone the buckle or slipped out of the restraining device. We can all readily visualise that happening. Only last night a mother told me that her child aged one and half can slip her way out of a restraining device in the rear of the car in only a minute and a half. She learnt that trick from her brother aged 4. We should not underestimate the ability of small children to act as little Houdinis and get out of all kinds of positions in which they do not feel comfortable.

If a parent or driver of the car was to say that the child had undone the buckle or slipped out of the restraining device, what is the policeman to do? Should he ask the child, "Is it true what your mum says? Is it correct that you managed to get out of the seat belt?"

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Is it not a fact that in nearly all cases the policeman will use his common sense, unlike some hon. Members who have spoken in Committee and this morning.

Mr. Waller: I think that most police officers are men and women of common sense. However, we all know of occasions when police officers have wanted to throw their weight about.

The question of reasonable excuse would put the police officer in a very difficult position. More significantly, it would be very difficult to enforce the legislation. If a driver made an excuse such as that to which I have referred, there would be no way of ascertaining whether it was correct. If a driver was stopped, the excuse to which I have referred would be the obvious thing to say. The driver would say, "Of course he was in the device at the beginning of the journey. Oh dear, he must have slipped out." It is difficult to see how a prosecution could be brought because no one would be able to gainsay that excuse.

Mr. Day: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is addressing this matter as if we were debating Third Reading and not specifically new clause 1.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): As far as the Chair is concerned, the hon. Gentleman is making a valiant attempt to introduce new clause 1.

Mr. Waller: I am anxious to address myself only to points of detail that should be included in an explanatory statement.

Ms. Harman: Would it not be helpful for the Minister to tell us this morning that he will take some initiative to encourage manufacturers to develop rear seats and other devices for small children specifically designed to enable parents to put children into them and take them out easily but which would be very difficult for a child to get out of? The buckle of some devices is fixed on a child's tummy and the first thing that the child fiddles with is the buckle. Is that not a design problem which the manufacturers must address? Should not the Minister encourage them to do that? Does he not agree——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The new clause deals with regulation-making powers, not manufacturers' powers.

Mr. Waller: You have taken the words out of my mouth, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, I entirely agree with the hon. Lady's comments. Many people with whom I have discussed this issue have said that they would be more willing to use such devices if they were better designed.

10 am

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order to discuss regulations that could apply to manufacturers to ensure that the devices are workable?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Not under this clause. There may be an opportunity to do so later, with the amendments which are before the House. This clause relates to regulations.

Mr. Waller: I have made careful note of your comments, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I shall seek to avoid being drawn into issues that may be relevant to other amendments or to the Third Reading of the Bill. Essentially, I wish to confine my comments to the new clause.

Another "reasonable excuse" to which the statement should address itself is whether it would be reasonable never to restrain a child because of its tantrums. Some people might consider that to be a reasonable excuse, and others might not. Some courts, seeing the child in question and having sympathy for the mother or father, might not expect the parents to restrain the child.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Fair point.

Mr. Waller: I would find it a reasonable excuse. I am grateful for the support of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who, like other Members, might also consider it to be a reasonable excuse. Some magistrates might, but others might not. The only way in which we can start to provide greater safety for children is to allow for such matters in the regulations—but they should not be included unless the House has first had an opportunity to consider them by means of a statement. Once the regulations themselves arrive on the Floor of the House, we shall have no opportunity to amend them if we believe that, on this occasion, the Minister has got them wrong.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) mentioned my support for him. On occasions, and however difficult the situation may be, somebody has to say in this Chamber, "Most of the country wants these seat belts. It all sounds good, and it looks good in the tabloids. But what about the regulations?" What will the public say when they see the regulations and ask, "Who passed this lot?" We shall have to reply that it was pushed through one Friday morning, because the House was a bit conscious of something else.

The hon. Gentleman is drawing to our attention the fact that the regulations must be spot on, because we shall all be held responsible for them. I should like to know, for instance, whether the regulations will apply to ministerial cars. Will rear seat belts be fitted to ministerial cars? Not many Ministers could use them, but they do sit in the back. some of them tell me that they lie down in the back of their cars, late at night. Who could use such seat belts? Could the Minister for Sport slip into one? It is just possible. I should like to know whether rear seat belts will be fitted to ministerial cars and to the other vehicles in the car pool.

Mr. Waller: One of the Sunday newspapers printed a story the other week that the Minister for Sport had four children. The following week, the newspaper had to print a retraction, saying that the Minister for Sport had never been married and had no children at all, and apologising to him for any distress the story caused.

As to the hon. Gentleman's first point, and as is often the case, he has hit the nail absolutely on the head. Often, it is only when laws come into effect that we receive complaints from our constituents and are asked why we did not do something at the time. The country is not at this time aware of what is passing through the House and we have a responsibility to act on behalf of our constituents to ensure that we get this legislation right. The best way of doing that is by giving the House an opportunity of seeing a statement before the regulations come before it.

Even if the courts try to create criteria for what constituted a "reasonable excuse", the point is bound to be reached where courts will have a totally different concept of what is or what is not reasonable. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that it is very unsatisfactory to have laws enforced in haphazard and varied ways, if they can be enforced at all. Indeed, I have suggested that there might be some difficulty in enforcing such laws.

Another "reasonable excuse" which a driver might give, and which the House should consider before the regulations are put before it, is this. The driver might say, "I am only the driver. There is someone in the back of the car who knows the children far better than I do. If that person has undone the seat belt, I can hardly be held responsible."

I come to the points made by the hon. Members for Shettleston and for Stretford in respect of taxis. A taxi driver who claimed that he asked at the beginning of the journey for the children to be restrained but that, by the time his taxi was stopped by the police, they were not, would have a reasonable excuse. I have suggested that it might be worth while incorporating in the Bill a different provision so that the person in charge of the child could be held responsible. In some cases that might be fairer than expecting the driver to be held responsible for what happens. Those are alternative approaches and they should both be considered.

Mr. Forth: Can my hon. Friend tell those of us who did not have an opportunity to serve on the Standing Committee or to follow this matter closely until now whether he has received an indication from the sponsor of the Bill or from the Minister that exemptions will be made for taxi drivers? He has skipped rather lightly over that point. We have made exemptions for taxi drivers in other legislation because of their individual and unique situation. I am sure that my hon. Friend will not forget mini cabs. He may be referring only to black cabs, but mini cabs are an increasing force to be reckoned with in the transporting of fare-paying passengers. Will there be exemptions to deal with those problems?

Mr. Waller: I can best respond to my hon. Friend's comments by quoting what was said by the Minister in Standing Committee on 27 April:

"There are many issues still to be resolved when deciding how the law should apply in practice."

However, as far as I can recall, he said nothing about any exemptions that might apply to taxis. He may do so later.

Mr. Forth: I hope that he does.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I may be able to help the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller). I have, for example, passed correspondence and representations from the Bradford Taxi Proprietors' Association to the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). The association has made extremely sensible representations about the need for exemptions—I hope to make a short contribution later this morning. It is important that the Minister, when he replies, makes clear the fact that the consultations will include taxi interests and that there will be specific exemption for taxis from the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. Waller: I agree with the hon. Gentleman; it is important that consultations should go as wide as possible. They must obviously include those representing taxi drivers. The best way of ensuring that we get all of this right is to allow the House, after the consultations have taken place, to consider the proposed regulations. Our debate today shows that many hon. members have their own views. There cannot be detailed consultations with every hon. Member without something being put before the House.

Another issue to which a statement should address itself is that raised by my hon. Friend the Minister in Standing Committee, when he stated:

"The Bill requires only that restraints which are fitted should be used, not that all children in the rear of cars be restrained."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C; 27 April 1988, c. 9.]

I believe that that is the answer to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman). My hon. Friend appears to agree that at this stage it would be unreasonable to tell the public that all children must be restrained whether or not suitable restraints exist. The provision does not seem to be limited to ordinary seat belts, and I feel that people could be deterred from fitting restraints if, once fitted, they must always be used. The Bill appears to require a belt to be used even if it is not the law of the land that they be fitted. This is an important point.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised that point, which is of concern to parents with very young children. When my daughter was one year old, I was strongly advised that in no circumstances should the rear seat belts be used. I was advised instead to acquire a specific restraint which became useless after a couple of years. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is necessary for the regulations to address that point?

Mr. Waller: I am sure that my hon. Friend was given wise advice, and that that is exactly the sort of issue that would be considered in regulations.

Ms. Harman rose——

Mr. Waller: I will give way this once, but I do not want to do so too many times as it delays our proceedings.

Ms. Harman: May I refer to the regulations as they affect clause 1(3)(c), concerning the description of the seat belt to be worn and the manner in which it is to be fixed and used? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the point made by the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), and the point that he himself was making when the hon. Gentleman intervened, could be met if the Minister took the initiative to ensure that design advances, particularly in relation to removable shells which can be put in ordinary adult seat belts——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That does not arise on the new clause.

Mr. Waller: I should like to read a quotation from Hansard which I think is relevant to what I have been saying:

"As things stand—and I cannot conceive that any Government will move from this position—the intention is not to require compulsory wearing where there is not compulsory fitting. I cannot believe that if any Minister of Transport brought forward regulations on any other basis, the House would give its approval to them."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 23 January 1980; c. 78.]

Those were the words of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, then a Transport Minister, during the Committee stage of the Road Traffic (Seat Belts) Bill. However, as I understand it, this Bill would enable a Minister to say that because a child restraint is fitted, even if it is not a legal requirement, it must be used. We are apparently making provision for something that a Transport Minister in 1980 said that he could not imagine any Government of any persuasion doing.

My hon. Friend the Minister has said that if there is a seat belt available for a child, the child should wear it. Of course, we agree that if a seat belt is available the child should wear it; but is my hon. Friend also saying that if the seat belt is available the child must wear it? That is what I understand from the Bill.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has put his finger on another important point. He has illustrated very elegantly the difference of view that can occur with a change of Minister. He has suggested that a Conservative Minister took a view at one time, while our present Minister—whom we all love and respect very dearly—might take another view. But does my hon. Friend share my view that were our Minister to move on to greater things, as we all hope that he will in due course, his successor may in turn take a different view of this important matter at precisely the time that the regulations are being dealt with?

Mr. Waller: That is one reason why I am always very sceptical about statutory instruments, and the possibility that new statutory instruments may be laid before Parliament which the House has not envisaged in the past. Regrettably there has been a trend away from primary legislation toward incorporating more and more substantial proposals in secondary legislation. That could be avoided to some extent if a statement were laid before Parliament before the regulations came before it.

Mrs. Wise: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that during this Parliament there has been an increasing and distressing tendency for Bills to be shells? Does he extend his strictures to Government and private Members' Bills alike? Should not the House accept its responsibility for considering the detail of legislation?

10.15 am

Mr. Waller: I do not want to be drawn out of order. I am continually being tempted, and I find it difficult to resist temptation when posed by hon. Ladies such as the one who has just spoken. Nevertheless, I shall resist it.

We have only to look at the words of Ministers to see the difference that can emerge over a very short time. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister said:

"If passed, the Bill will require restraints to be used where fitted."

Nothing could be clearer. If the belts are not fitted, they do not have to be used, but once fitted they must be used. My hon. Friend appears to be saying that the Bill will require what his predecessor said that he could not conceive of any Government requiring—wearing when fitting is not compulsory.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the hon. Gentleman cast his mind over the difference raised a moment ago between statutory instruments being dealt with in a private Member's Bill such as this, and statutory instruments tabled by the Government? Is he not concerned that, once the private Member's Bill is passed, it will be the Government who produce the statutory instrument? There is always a danger that, whatever the defects of a statutory instrument, Conservative Members will be required by the Whips to go willy-nilly into the Lobbies and vote for any rubbish that the Government lay on the Table.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I see the point—it is most interesting—but the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is speaking to new clause 1, on regulations.

Mr. Waller: I always listen carefully to what the hon. Gentleman says, and I look forward to what he will probably say very shortly.

In Committee, the Minister said:

"It is up to Parliament to decide what to do with the Bill, but it will be up to Government to consider what regulations to bring before Parliament if the Bill passes successfully through both Houses."

That is the distinction between Parliament and Government. We should have a little more input from the House. Perhaps it would be a good idea for an explanatory statement to be laid before the House before any statutory instrument was put forward, so that it could be discussed in advance.

My hon. Friend the Minister also said:

"we have a responsibility to provide legislation so that parents know what is right."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 27 April 1988; c. 10-12.]

Many issues relating to our efforts to do our best for children are promoted by organisations and by the Government. Some are in the highway code, but in very few cases do we consider legislation desirable, especially when it is so difficult to enforce it sensibly. Before considering a statutory instrument, we should consider carefully whether a regulation is necessary or whether it would be better for advice to be given in the highway code, and for persuasion rather than compulsion to be exercised to ensure that children are carried in cars as safely as possible.

I want to come to the second part of the——

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman may not have considered this but I think that it is important. He knows my views about the Common Market, harmonisation and all that jazz. I am not keen on, in fact I am very much opposed to, us having to knuckle under to the Germans, French and all the rest of them. However, I have no doubt that the regulations would have to be framed in such a way by the Tory Government, who crawl to the Common Market, as to satisfy the other nations around the table.

I want to know whether he has taken into account, and whether he will ask his hon. Friend the Minister to take into account, whether any discussions have taken place. If the Minister is to come back from the Common Market at any time with some tinpot harmonisation scheme on seat belts for kids, I will want to know from where it is derived. It would be a good thing if the hon. Gentleman drew the Minister's attention to that matter before it goes any further.

Mr. Waller: The hon. Gentleman has made a fair point. Often, we come forward with proposals that are out of step with those of other Community countries.

Mr. Skinner: I want them to be out of step.

Mr. Waller: Some people think that they should be out of step but other people, such as motor manufacturers, would prefer them to be in step. For example, one thinks of the dim-dip regulations, on which we are out of step with many other countries. One thinks also of the proposal for compulsory leg guards on motor cycles. That is different from the safety proposals for motor cycles in other countries. That is a fair point and it would be helpful to see in a statement laid before the House what account my hon. Friend the Minister, or whoever may be the Minister or the Secretary of State for Transport, has taken of the practices of other countries.

I take a rather different line on that. I believe that it is beneficial on the whole if our proposals are in tune with those of other countries. Then, people travelling from one country to another will know that the same laws apply and motor manufacturers who have to produce the vehicles will know that they can produce vehicles according to the construction and use regulations that will be satisfactory in other countries.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): While the hon. Gentleman is dealing with other European countries may I ask him whether he has seen the briefing done in relation to compulsory seat belt wearing by the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety? It says:

"In the majority of European countries, seat belt legislation for adults has preceded child restraint legislation, although many now require belt use in the front seat only."

This is the important point—

"This has had the effect of encouraging children to travel in the rear, usually unrestrained."

Mr. Waller: It is interesting how different countries have different laws. It is certainly true that there has been a tendency for small children to be carried in the rear of vehicles in many cases, even though there may not be a restraint. That is something to which there have been many references in previous debates about the issue.

Mr. Cryer: One of the interesting aspects of this is that under the European Communities Act 1972 a Minister can be designated for the purposes of that Act and that enables a Department to use the powers in the Act to supplement and extend the scope of regulations that may be brought under this legislation. In a way, it is a back door method of increasing a Minister's delegated powers without anything being brought before the House. Will the hon. Gentleman give his attention to the fact that he should consider the consequences of the widening of powers through that designation? The designation instrument itself is generally by negative procedure and is hardly ever brought to the attention of hon. Members.

Mr. Waller: There is obviously a great danger with any regulations, which would inevitably be brought before the House late at night without the attention of the media. However, I am sure that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) would do his best, with his customary diligence, to ensure that they received adequate attention.

The second major element of new clause 1 is the requirement for the House to have another opportunity of considering the regulations by their coming before it again after three years. After those three years we shall have had an opportunity of seeing how they operate in practice. Before the previous seat belt regulations were renewed the Department of Transport commissioned a statistical survey on the effects of seat belt wearing. It was carried out by two academics, Messrs. Durbin and Harvey. Some interesting conclusions emerged from that report, and it would be useful to have another such report.

In such a report, which could be considered by Parliament, I would like to see more reliable statistics based upon accidents as well as casualties. The statistics relating to casualties should be put in a way that provides more real information. I wonder whether people are aware that if one fractures a finger, it is classified as a serious injury because it is a fracture. The same applies if one is in hospital for a night. Yet, there are many injuries that we would consider more serious, but which happen to be classified as minor. It has been estimated that as many as 60 per cent. of all cyclist casualties—I want to show in a moment how the question of cyclists relates to the issue —are not recorded because the cyclist does not go to hospital or receive medical treatment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): My hon. Friend is right in saying that there is high under-recording of injuries to cyclists. It is not because they do not go to hospital, but because they do not say that they received their injuries in a traffic accident.

Mr. Waller: I wondered how that came to be. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for explaining how the statistics appear to under-record road accidents to cyclists. That makes me even more concerned about the possible effects of the Bill because of the risk compensation theory put forward by a number of academics such as Dr. John Adams. Dr. Adams suggests that by introducing seat belts we are transferring the risk from the occupants of the car to other road users.

Mr. Peter Bottomley rose——

Mr. Waller: I see that my hon. Friend the Minister wishes to intervene but I should say that it is my belief that the risk compensation hypothesis applies to the rear seat occupants of cars as well as drivers because drivers take account of the people in the car and the extent to which those people are secure. As I said on Second Reading, if there is a crate of eggs in the rear seat of the car and it is bolted down, one will drive more carefully——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are not on Second Reading. He keeps referring to the points that he made on Second Reading, in which I was interested. However, we are no longer at that stage of the Bill. I believe that he was dealing with the second element in his new clause.

Mr. Waller: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Minister who tried to intervene earlier.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The second part of my hon. Friend's new clause would be better informed if he knew that the number of pedestrians killed was the lowest since records began in 1926. That demolishes part of any exaggerated case of homeostasis, which is the fancy way of describing risk compensation.

Mr. Waller: Yes, of course. I am as delighted as my hon. Friend the Minister to know that pedestrian casualties are down. However, I am afraid that this is a classic case of post hoc ergo propter hoc.

Many other improvements in road safety have been to the benefit of pedestrians. For example, construction and use regulations now require that cars should not have dangerous projections, so that cyclists and pedestrians are less likely to suffer injury. As we now have evidential breath testing rather than the need to take samples of blood or urine, perhaps there is a greater tendency for people who might be drunk to decide not to take the car out, or not to drive it home. Therefore, pedestrians will be more secure, because a very large proportion of pedestrians are hit during the hours of darkness, the drink-driving hours.

10.30 am

We have to be cautious about such statistics. Of course, they should be covered in a report which is brought before Parliament three years after the regulations initially come into effect, but we should be particularly careful about them. We should not necessarily assume that the measure we have brought into effect has produced any improvement.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Is my hon. Friend aware that a report sponsored by the Department of Transport and quoted in Dr. Adams' book says that, although there was an overall fall in the number of deaths relating to cars—pedestrians, cyclists and the people in cars—on analysis, the number of pedestrians and cyclists killed increased above that which would have been anticipated in relation to car accidents, while the number of deaths in accidents involving heavy duty vehicles where belts are not required decreased. The statistics show that one would expect a decrease, but on analysis there was no decrease in relation to belted-up people. Perhaps the Minister would like to clarify that, as the study was carried out by Durbin and Harvey and sponsored by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One has to draw a distinction between the pedestrians and cyclists hit by private cars to which the seat belt legislation applies and those hit by vehicles to which it does not apply. If one compares the figures for the two categories, there is a notable distinction, so we have a control group. My hon. Friend's suggestion about reduced injuries to pedestrians is very welcome, but should not necessarily be taken as an indication that the benefits are due to seat belt wearing. In fact the opposite could apply.

If there is another report along the lines of the one by Durbin and Harvey, The Lancet may make the same kind of comment that it made about the previous report, when it stated:

"There will be regret that the evidence on death is not more one-sided; and disappointment that the measure has fallen short of its promise."

I do not want the new measure to fall short of its promise. One way of ensuring that it does measure up to its promise if it becomes law is to ensure that a proper report is brought before Parliament, and that at every stage Parliament has the opportunity of considering the statistics.

I ask my hon. Friend whether it would be possible to provide the House with better statistics than we have been able to rely on until now. One problem is that we have no figures about non-injury accidents. Therefore, we cannot properly test the hypothesis of Dr. John Adams that, if one requires the occupants of cars to be belted in, there are more accidents, and, although the occupants of the car will be better protected, perhaps the risk will be transferred to other people who are less well protected than those in the car.

Mrs. Gorman: Material is emerging to show that although the number of fatalities among car drivers is dropping, and although the number of children who go through the widscreen may be reduced by the legislation, the nature of accidents is different and many people survive only to be paralysed for the rest of their lives.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to remind the hon. Lady that we are dealing with regulation-making powers and not with accidents. Later in the debate the hon. Lady may have the opportunity to develop her point.

Mr. Waller: I entirely agree with you, Madam Deputy Speaker. That point could be made better in relation to other amendments, or perhaps on Third Reading.

However, if a report comes before the House, I do not want to have to read statements such as appear on page 51 of the report by Durbin and Harvey:

"There remains strong evidence of a substantial increase in the number of cyclists killed in accidents with cars."

That situation is undesirable, and perhaps can be avoided if the House has the opportunity to consider the regulations and reports from the Department of Transport before the regulations are made, and at a subsequent stage before they are renewed. Essentially, that is what the new clause is about and I hope that the House will accept it.

Mr. Madden: I shall speak only briefly. I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) on presenting a very important Bill which will save many young people from death or serious injury.

I declare an interest as a sponsored member of the Transport and General Workers Union which organises and represents the interests of taxi drivers in many parts of the country. I wish to speak on that specific point. As I said earlier, I have passed correspondence from the Bradford Taxi Proprietors' Association to the hon. Member for Cheadle and to my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). I am aware that the Minister has seen that correspondence and is concerned to do what he can to reassure taxi drivers, taxi proprietors and taxi interests.

The position was clearly illustrated by the Minister in Standing Committee. He said:

"Child injury in cars is one form of human adversity from which we do not want lawyers to profit, and that is why it is important that the regulations are well discussed, laid in draft and involve as many people as possible, including family organisations . . . We want to be sure that all practical possibilities are covered. We may say in some cases, 'The good is necessary; the best is impossible.' If three adults and two children were packed into the back of a car, in practice, none would be able to wear seat belts; there would be two seat belts that could not be used. I am not saying that under the regulations that would be one of the exemptions, but we must consider such cases.

If there are three small children aged, say, eight, in the rear of a car that has two seat belts, the regulations are likely to say that two children must be belted up while the third will be unrestrained. It is not pleasant to look at three children, play the balloon game and decide which is to be unprotected, but that need not detain us this morning.

We shall try to produce regulations that make exemptions. I am getting advice from my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley and others. But the exemptions must be the necessary exemptions. I emphasise time and again that most children travel, most of the time, in their own family car with their own parents, and there is likely to be no trouble."

The Minister went on to say:

"A more tricky question is what happens if so many people are being carried in the back of a car that they cannot wear the belts.

The debate has illustrated the difficulties of trying to write into primary legislation some of the exemptions known to be necessary. But, as well as emphasising the sensible way in which the Bill has dealt with the issues the debate has shown that the regulations will need to make the wearing of child restraints practical, so that children have that extra, necessary protection."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 27 April 1988; c. 14-15.]

I am sure that we all agree with that, because we want the legislation to be acceptable to the vast majority of the public, in this case the parents of children. We also want the legislation and the regulations to be enforceable. Therefore we need regulations to exempt taxis, private hire vehicles and other categories of vehicles that are used for public hire.

The Bradford Taxi Proprietors' Association believes that under the Bill taxi drivers would have to refuse to carry families if all children under 18 were unable to wear seat belts in the rear of taxis or other public vehicles, thereby losing fares and income. If they did otherwise they would be in breach of the law. The Minister must clearly spell out the position.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the difficulties about the regulations might be that working women with children at school might ask neighbours or friends with children at the same school to pick up their children, which would lead to additional children being in the back of those cars? That often happens when women who are working have children at school. How would the regulations apply to such cases?

Mr. Madden: My hon. Friend has pointed, as did the Minister in Committee, to another set of circumstances that show that the existing regulations are defective. The Minister said in Committee that he would consult widely. He needs to be more specific today and to give clear assurances.

Many tributes have been paid to the Minister. He is a reasonable person. We are all impressed by the diligence he has shown, but I wonder what would happen if the Minister were to meet with an unfortunate accident caused, shall we say, by the proverbial No. 11 bus or, even worse, if he were to receive an unwelcome telephone call from No. 10 Downing Street? We have to provide for the time when an unreasonable Minister might not make sensible regulations and sensible exemptions.

The Minister must reply to the points that have been put to him by the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) and by a number of my hon. Friends. I urge him specifically to exempt from the regulations taxis, private hire vehicles and other public vehicles that come into that category. The public and the trade would welcome such an exemption. It would ensure that the important provisions of the Bill are well received by the vast majority of the public and by those whose responsibility it will be to enforce its provisions.

Mr. Day: While speaking to new clause 1, may I take the opportunity also to speak to my amendment No. 18.

The Bill seeks to implement the negative resolution procedure. As my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said, that is quite correct. In that respect, it mirrors the legislation that provides for the wearing of seat belts by children in the front seats of cars. The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has tabled amendments that are similar to mine, and I have discussed them with my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley. My amendment No. 18 deals with the same issues and would achieve the same results as the amendments that stand in the name of the hon. Member for Bradford, South. When he deals with his amendments, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will say that he intends to withdraw his amendments to support my amendment No. 18.

I do not believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley was right to suggest that my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic should say now what the regulations will contain. That would make nonsense of the consultation procedure that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley believes is so important. If there are to be consultations, they must be meaningful.

10.45 am

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend misunderstands me. I have said that my hon. Friend the Minister cannot be expected to spell out now everything that will be contained in the regulations, but when he is thinking about the kind of regulations that ought to be laid he ought to make a statement so that the regulations can be considered properly and amendments made before it becomes impossible for amendments to be made.

Mr. Day: I accept the majority of the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley and the hon. Member for Bradford, South have made, but my amendment No. 18 covers them. It would provide for the regulations to be discussed by the House. I think that my hon. Friend the Minister accepts the validity of amendment No. 18.

The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) referred to the fact that he had approached me about the representations made by the Bradford Taxi Proprietors' Association. The National Federation of Taxicab Associations has also been in touch with me and it attended the Committee sittings. I have kept in informed about progress. The National Federation of Taxicab Associations does not oppose the principle of the Bill or its aim. I assured the federation that its point of view would be put before the Committee. It was also put before the Committee by other hon. Members, and the Minister is aware of its views. I hope that the Minister will take those views into account.

A few hon. Members have tried to disprove the validity of the safety factor when seat belts are worn in the rear of motor cars, but most of the statistics are overwhelmingly in favour of their use. The Bill is designed to save the lives of young children. They are unable to make decisions for themselves. I ask those hon. Members to reflect on what they have said. The fact is that 91 per cent. of drivers support the principle of the Bill: that there should be compulsory restraint of children in the rear of motor cars, and 90 per cent. of the public support the principle of compulsory restraint. The view that those hon. Members hold may be honourable, but it is mistaken. It is out of step with the views of most hon. Members and with the majority of public opinion.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Have you received any notification that a Minister will come to the House to make a statement on a factory closure in my constituency? Yesterday, KP Foods announced that it would close a factory, with the consequent loss of 1,000 jobs. As you will understand, this has left the town dazed and in complete shock.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Speaker has had no indication from any Minister that a statement will be made today.

Mr. Cryer: I should be happy if a Minister came to make a statement to allow my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) to ask questions. I understand that you can do nothing about that, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is a dereliction of duty on the part of the Government not to make a statement when such a serious decision has been made.

I shall deal briefly with the amendments because the slowest marathon runner in the House, the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), dwelt extensively on new clause 1, to which my amendments relate. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will exercise much stricter judgment when Ministers abuse their powers and bring before the House statutory instruments which have validity only because they were passed by a large Conservative majority.

My three amendments are straightforward. I accept the comment of the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) that amendment No. 18 deals with the proposition in the same way and provides that the regulations should be made by affirmative procedure. My amendments set out the position much more clearly. I sometimes wish that those who draft legislation would aim to keep legislation as readable as possible. It is not satisfactory to the ordinary user of legislation to have to refer to sections in a 1972 Act. My amendments provide for the insertion after "regulations" of

"approved by affirmative procedure by both Houses".

It is necessary for the House to adopt the affirmative procedure more extensively. We do not deal effectively with delegated powers. Other legislatures are well ahead of us in scrutinising Ministers' powers. This worthy legislation has the power of criminal sanctions behind it and we do not oppose it, because it will reduce the number of lives lost. Legislation exists because people are not universally of good will and we must set a pattern of conduct. That conduct is enforced by the application of criminal sanctions. We leave it to Ministers and civil servants to produce the words that enforce these standards of conduct. We give that important obligation to the Minister, but we do not have a procedure by which we can scrutinise or change the Minister's measures. My amendments unfortunately provide no opportunity to change the legislation.

The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, which I chair, was set up after major errors were made in 1945 in the wording of a statutory instrument. Before then, there had been several criticisms of the way in which the House was handing over more and more detail to Ministers. In his book, Lord Justice Hewart, who was no Left-wing judge —not that there ever have been any—described the powers that we give Ministers as the "new despotism". I do not accept that all-embracing criticism. The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments frequently deals with instruments that are ambiguous, ultra vires—beyond Ministers' powers—and badly drafted, and reports on those matters to the House. It reports also on any other matters that do no go to the merits of the policies behind statutory instruments. The Joint Committee's terms of reference do not allow it to debate those merits. The Joint Committee does a reasonable job, but its position is not well regarded. It has no power to require a debate or to hold up legislation.

The negative procedure on statutory instruments may remain a mystery to most hon. Members. A consultative document may be issued and people told that a statutory instrument will be produced. They do not have a clue what that means. They certainly do not know that, when an instrument is laid before the House for 40 days and there is a prayer against it, there is only a chance that the instrument will be debated.

Back Benchers know that if we table a prayer, the chances of the Government giving time for it are slim. A prayer is debated only if Front Benchers add their names to it to put a bit of pressure on the Government and to ask them—it is not a statutory requirement—to provide time to debate it. That is unsatisfactory, especially for an instrument of this calibre, which imposes criminal sanctions and exempts people from fitting seat belts. Under the regulations, certain vehicles or classes can be exempted.

I endorse the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and support the representations of the Bradford Taxi Proprietors' Association to exempt hackney carriages. The exemptions will be made under regulations. Section 33C(3)(c) prescribes

"the description of seat belt to be worn by children . . . and the manner in which such a belt is to be fixed and used."

The detailed application will be made by regulation. A system that allows these matters to be dealt with by negative procedure is a poor system.

The regulations will be complicated. They will be widely applicable to every vehicle that is prescribed. Every child within a certain prescribed age will be required to be restrained by a seat belt of the description given in the statutory instrument. The statutory instrument will be widely read and widely used by the motoring organisations, daily press and so on. If we allow it to proceed under a negative resolution, hon. Members may try to lay a prayer because there are loopholes or inconsistencies. The Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments may report that the Minister has used more powers than he has been given in the Bill and in the linked legislation, the Road Traffic Act 1972.

The prayer may be debated, but what happens then? A prayer is considered for an hour and a half after 10 o'clock. If a number of votes are taken, there is only just over an hour, with luck, to debate the regulations. The House cannot take statutory instruments in separate parts. We have to decide on the whole thing, whether we like it or not. The temptation is for a Government caught out with an ultra vires provision not to admit that they have made a muck of things. Ministers do not tend to say, "I shall certainly get hold of the draftsman and tell him to be more careful in future." They usually say, "It is a technicality; I urge my hon. Friends to vote for the statutory instrument." The Minister's hon. Friends then go into the Lobby to vote for the instrument because the Whips have imposed a three-line Whip.

11 am

Our method of dealing with genuine questions of procedure and matters of error and poor judgment may have nothing to do with the merits of the instrument. Hon. Members who agree with the policy merits of regulations but feel that they are poorly drafted do not have the opportunity to amend them. The Procedure Committee should consider carefully improving our procedures for delegated power because there is now such a volume of legislation in the hands of Ministers—and therefore civil servants—that the House is losing its ability to scrutinise matters that ought to be very much within its power.

Mr. Waller: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is particularly important that there should be scrutiny in this case, given that it is literally a matter of life or death?

Mr. Cryer: I agree that it is important in this case and my amendments would have that effect. However, such scrutiny is also important in many other cases. I have repeatedly argued in Standing Committees that the affirmative procedure should be used more widely and that the negative procedure should be used only for genuinely minor statutory instruments such as those bringing into operation an Act that the House has already passed. Most hon. Members are not in my fortunate position. I have to examine every statutory instrument produced by every Minister that goes before the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. They are legion. On average, we deal with 2,000 of them a year. Some of them simply bring into operation an Act of Parliament, but even they are often 10 and 15 pages long. They are minor works of complicated legislative art. I urge the House——

Mrs. Wise: I apologise if I have missed something. Has my hon. Friend dealt properly with the fact that we seem to have no control over ultra vires provisions that are brought before the House?

Mr. Cryer: Such matters are better dealt with by the affirmative procedure. That is why my amendments urge the adoption of the affirmative procedure, whereby a statutory instrument is not approved until it has at least 1½ hours' debate on an affirmative resolution on the Floor of the House. Even so, I agree with my hon. Friend that that is still very unsatisfactory. I am advocating the best of a very poor choice of options.

Let us suppose that a Minister brings before the House on the affirmative procedure a provision that is ultra vires. If he will not sink his pride and accept the view of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, what happens then? Incidentally, we do not pull our opinions like a rabbit out of a hat. Mr. Speaker's counsel is our legal adviser. When we recommend that provisions be regarded as ultra vires, we do so only after serious consideration, and generally on his recommendation. If the Minister does not sink his pride but says, "It is a technicality" and the instrument is passed, any challenge must then go to the courts. That is a very expensive procedure. Most ordinary people cannot possibly go to law. Like the Ritz hotel, it is open to everyone who can afford to pay, and most people cannot. As regulations under the Bill will affect millions of people —all those who carry children in the back of their cars —we should make absolutely sure that we get them right. That is why I argue that the affirmative procedure should be used.

Even if the affirmative procedure is used there are still faults to be found. The first is the lack of time on the Floor of the House, although we have the full 1½ hours which we do not for the negative procedure. That debate cannot be interrupted, so if we are given the affirmative procedure we should be humbly grateful for the extra 20 minutes or so of debate on instruments that affect millions.

Sometimes, there is not enough time on the Floor of the House, so statutory instruments are dealt with by merits committees. Some hon. Members may not yet have served on them. I suggest that they contact their Whips who will be only too happy to appoint them to such committees. It has to be said that the merits committees are not an overwhelming success. People frequently ask me about them because they are called Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments. That simply means that they have the power to pass a resolution affirming a statutory instrument. The provisions are dealt with on Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday morning in one of the Committee Rooms. The Government organise a quorum, and the Labour Opposition generally turn up. I cannot recall that the Liberals, or the SLD or the SDP—or whatever they are called these days attend zealously.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): I have been to four.

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Gentleman is becoming a veteran in these matters.

The committees' sittings are often over in 10 or 15 minutes. That procedure, with all its shortcomings, is still preferable to the negative procedure because it gives hon. Members an opportunity to oppose a faulty statutory instrument. They have merely to go to their Whips and ask to serve on the committee. One of the virtues of the merits committees is that any hon. Member can speak but not vote. I hope that over the coming weeks many hon. Members will be attending the committees and practising their speeches so that they are prepared when regulations under the Bill come before the House. It is a useful device. Although this place has its shortcomings, one of its great virtues is that it consists of a lot of loopholes strung together. If one wants strongly enough to raise a subject one can always find a loophole. The merits committees provide such an opportunity. I urge my hon. Friends to make use of them when the need arises.

I do not want to speak for too long because of the amount of time taken by the hon. Member for Keighley. However, I must deal with the question of EEC harmonisation, to which I referred in an intervention. It is important, because harmonisation is growing through delegated powers. There has been a change in legislative functions by virtue of the fact that under the European Communities Act 1972 Ministers are designated for the purposes of the Act as Ministers under the Act. That gives them more powers to produce wider delegated legislation. Therefore, I would argue that that legislation should be brought to the attention of the House, and hence of the public, through the affirmative procedure. We would then know about any move by the Common Market to harmonise standards for seat belts. The hon. Member for Keighley said that he favoured such a standard. However, we may find that for our manufacturers and for our purposes there are certain differences that we want to retain. We should be told whether that is the case. That is why the affirmative procedure is the important procedure. We would be more likely to find out about such moves.

I could ask all those hon. Members who take the daily statutory instrument list to raise their hands. My guess is that there would not be many takers. However, only those who take the daily statutory instrument list know about the instruments that are going through the negative procedure—or the affirmative procedure, for that matter, but the negative procedure is the most arcane—and they are the only ones who would know whether the Minister was attempting to extend his delegated power under the European Communities Act 1972, which would have wide repercussions because of harmonisation pressures from the Common Market.

Therefore, the affirmative procedure seems perferable. As the instrument is included in the Orders of the Day we know that the instrument is being dealt with. Orders of the Day are taken by all hon. Members, and as there are notices about the instruments that are dealt with in Committee, hon. Members are much better notified with that procedure. Therefore, the arguments for the affirmative procedure seem overwhelmingly superior.

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): Yes, we understand that now.

Mr. Cryer: Well, the hon. Gentleman says that he now understands. It is true that I have spent between 10 and 15 minutes explaining it, but I do not often get the opportunity of talking about statutory instruments and I get frustrated at not being able to talk about them——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely on the point of his amendments, but the House is extremely well informed by this time. I am sure that he does not want to become over-repetitive.

Mr. Cryer: I do not want to go over ground that I have gone over before but I do not want any doubts to arise. As I have said, Madam Deputy Speaker, I want to be brief because of the enormous amount of time that was taken earlier. I know that many more hon. Members wish to speak about the Bill and about the Bill that follows it on the Order Paper, so I am willing to withdraw my three amendments following an assurance from the promoter of the Bill that the arcane amendment that he has tabled meets my point and that the affirmative procedure will be used.

Mrs. Wise rose——

Mr. Cryer: I shall deal with this point first.

The hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) raised an eyebrow at the fact that I have taken between 10 and 15 minutes to elaborate my point. However, the fact is that until I tabled my amendments, the regulations, of such wide coverage and importance, were to go through on the negative procedure. Everybody, including the hon. Gentleman, is now convinced that the affirmative procedure is the best procedure. I convinced him in 10 to 15 minutes. Why was the Department of Transport not convinced earlier that that procedure would be better when it advised the promoter? Why did the civil servants not bring forward the affirmative procedure so that we would not need this debate? Today the scrutiny of this House has improved the Bill.

If I have to spray it on the eyeballs again and again so that the Minister and the civil servants in the Box will take back the message that the affirmative procedure should be used every possible time, I shall. When we receive evidence from civil servants in Committee and ask them which procedure they would prefer, they always say the negative procedure because it is more convenient for them. There is less likelihood of a debate so they do not have to provide ministerial briefs. The arguments are not brought out into the open and are less open to scrutiny, as is the Minister. By and large, Ministers do not like to be under too much scrutiny.

My remarks may have been a little tedious, but I am sure that they were absolutely fascinating to my hon. Friends. However, although I regret it, the fact is that we must go through this process to improve the procedures of our House.

Mrs. Wise: I am worried by my hon. Friend's agreement to withdraw his amendments. I may be entirely wrong so I am asking for clarification. My hon. Friend's amendments have the great advantage that I can understand them. They state clearly:

"'by affirmative procedure by both Houses'".

One need only look at them to understand exactly what my hon. Friend means. I find amendment No. 18, which is to be used instead, more obscure. I should like to know whether my hon. Friend is absolutely certain about accepting amendment No. 18 and that he is not relying on assurances from across the Floor. Unless he is certain in his own mind that his amendments are properly dealt with by amendment No. 18, he should ask the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) to withdraw amendment No. 18 in favour of his amendments.

Mr. Cryer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. However, I have received assurances in good faith and one must accept them. I have no doubt that the Minister, who will probably be called next, will give me a further categorical cast-iron guarantee that amendment No. 18 meets the points without putting them into the clear language that I have used.

I advised my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) earlier that we have got into a mess with drafting. There is no question about it. Our legislation is utterly incomprehensible to the average citizen. It should not be incomprehensible, because it affects the average citizen. Legislation such as this should certainly not be incomprehensible. When the Minister produces regulations under the legislation, it is not sufficient for the average citizen with his car, rear seat belts for children and children in the prescribed age range simply to look at the instrument. He will almost certainly have to look at the Road Traffic Act 1972. However, where will he get a copy of that Act? Her Majesty's Stationery Office is in London, although there are a few branch offices, one of which is in Leeds. However, they are sub-offices and are not run by the Government. They do not carry a wide range of legislation, so the Act will have to be ordered. In other words, it is awkward for the ordinary citizen.

Although I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Preston, I do not want to insist on amendments which may produce consequences that have not been entirely foreseen. The Minister might say that he accepts my first amendment, which sets out clearly that the affirmative procedure in both Houses must be used. It states:

"after 'regulations' insert 'approved by affirmative procedure by both Houses'."

The Minister will give his views. Amendment No. 18 could be accepted and the Bill altered to make the position a little clearer to the average citizen. I advise the Minister that people in Bradford, South do not talk all day about affirmative resolutions of both Houses. However, they may have a clearer understanding, so I accept the Minister's point of view.

We have had a useful discussion and I am absolutely delighted that, following my suggestion, the promoter of the Bill has accepted my point and purpose without any hesitation as, I understand, the Minister does also. That is a useful demonstration of the way in which a Back Bencher can improve legislation by scrutiny. I hope that my points are taken on board and I certainly accept the promoter's amendment and the spirit behind it.

Mrs. Mahon: Further to the point of order that I raised earlier, Madam Deputy Speaker, about the factory closure in my constituency, could you give me some guidance about how a new hon. Member gets a Minister to make a statement and accede to the will of the House?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that there are several opportunities that the hon. Lady could use. One is parliamentary questions, or she might like to consider tabling a private notice question. However, that will have to be done next week. As the hon. Lady knows, the Chair has no authority to request a Minister to come here to make statements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has pointed out that what we are discussing is literally a matter of life and death and I believe that the House agrees. There is indisputable evidence that if a child is restrained in a car its chances of death or injury in a crash or collision are reduced by two thirds.

To some extent, we are involved in lotteries. Following the exemption regulations that will be made if the Bill is enacted some children will still be exposed to risk. The House must accept that this is one of a set of compromises. There seems to be general agreement that the approach of my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day)—to provide that where restraints are fitted children should be restrained unless they are exempted—is the better way forward, but it is not perfect. There is plenty of scope for the criticism that my hon. Friend or the Government should have proposed that no child should be carried in a vehicle unless he or she is restrained, but we are not going that far and we are taking this position openly.

The second lottery is that to a large extent it is a matter of chance when the family becomes aware of the importance of restraints in cars. Esther Rantzen, who headed the highly effective "That's Life" television campaign in 1986, which trebled the sale of restraints from 300,000 to 1 million per year, was one of those who put restraints in their cars only after the campaign had begun. For the child, it is a lottery as to when the parents decide to fit and to use restraints.

Frankly, it is also a lottery whether a Bill of this kind gets through the House. There are important amendments and new clauses for consideration and the whole House is aware that it does not take much to leave a Bill insufficient time to get through. I make no further comment.

The new clause and the associated amendments address the question whether the regulations should be subject to the affirmative procedure. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for raising that issue. Other issues are coming forward, including one from my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley, which I believe will also improve the Bill.

Mr. Waller: I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would respond to this important point. His predecessor said that he could not conceive of any Government moving from the position that the intention is not to require compulsory wearing when there is not compulsory fitting. It is my hon. Friend's intention, as his comments at earlier stages of the Bill suggested, that even though there is not compulsory fitting it will be compulsory to use a device if it is fitted?

Mr. Bottomley: Perhaps I may answer that question somewhat obliquely. Those who regard themselves as libertarians may say that one should not compromise—either we have our liberties or we do not—but I am not of that group. I believe that it would be going too far for the Government to support a Bill requiring every car which might carry a child to have restraints fitted, covering all generations—for instance, a rear-facing infant carrier and a booster cushion as well as an adaptor for an adult seat belt. I am a compromiser and I do not wish to go that far.

I suspect that in 1980 when my right hon. and learned Friend the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was responsible for these matters he had in mind that the next stage would be compulsory fitment of restraints. The present Bill does not propose that, and neither do I. To some extent, therefore, I am resiling from what my right hon. and learned Friend said. As I have said, I am a compromiser. The Government support the intention in the first part of the new clause that the affirmative procedure should apply. The negative procedure was previously acceptable to the Government because the fact that it was used in relation to children in the front seats of cars constituted a reasonable precedent. The issue having been raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, South and accepted by my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle in amendment No. 18, however, the Government are content with the affirmative procedure.

I shall certainly add the representatives of taxi operators and drivers to those to be consulted before the Government bring forward regulations. It is sensible to listen to the views of taxi drivers and important to consider the views of taxi users. We do not know whether a majority of drivers and users wish the regulations to cover children in the backs of taxis where restraints are already fitted. I certainly give an assurance that taxi interests will be taken into account.

The second part of the new clause deals with whether there should be a three-year experiment. The regulations covering children in the front seats of cars were not the subject of a three-year experiment and there is no good reason for making such a provision in this context. We publish the annual casualty report, "Road Accidents Great Britain", all the information is likely to be available and special studies can be undertaken. If the House discovered—I am sure that it will not—some counter-productive element in the combination of this legislation and the exemption regulations, we could return to the matter.

To put the matter in graphic terms, if in any other circumstances I held a child 5 ft above a glass table and dropped it head first, "criticism" would be an understatement for the way in which people would describe my action. If I took a child and threw it at a glass window as hard as I could, the effect would be less than that of a child hitting a windscreen in a crash at 20 mph. There is every reason for parents to fit and use restraints. The new clause and the amendment deal with whether it is appropriate—that is where the exemptions, affirmative resolutions and regulations come in—to get many more parents to ensure that our children who, most of the time, travel in our own cars, have a basic element of protection. All the public response that the Government have received shows that the public want that.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am grateful to be able to make an intervention rather than a speech, as I want the Bill to reach the statute book. It is an important measure and the all-party disablement group certainly takes that view. Will the Minister give an assurance that, in drafting the regulations, he will consult bodies such as RADAR, the Spastics Society and Mencap, which have an interest in the position of disabled children, which will have to be taken into account in the detailed aspects of the regulations?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes.

Mr. Forth: The House owes much gratitude both to my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) for introducing new clause 1, in which I am especially interested, and to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who has enlightened us considerably on the relationship between the role of Parliament writ large and the Executive. The hon. Gentleman speaks with the authority of one who has been a member of two Parliaments. He has also had the advantage of seeing, as I had the honour to see some time ago, the different way in which these matters are dealt with in the European context. In many ways, we can learn from other institutions and draw on what we have seen. The hon. Gentleman eloquently set out the difficulties involved.

I support the new clause because it has become obvious to me, even at this stage, that there is a considerable lacuna between what hon. Members wish and the position, as far as we can understand it, of my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department. As long as there is that difference or gap, we are entitled to ask, as my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has asked, for a full statement at an early stage of the direction in which we are heading, in advance of the detailed regulations being produced.

When we are dealing, as has been suggested many times, not just with life and death, but with matters that involve intervening in detail in the behaviour of families and individuals in the car, or wherever they are, we are entitled to know as fully and as early as possible exactly what will be involved, what the regulations will mean and how they will be put forward. A fact that has been alluded to more than once is that Ministers change. I have the greatest respect for the Minister for Roads and Traffic, but we cannot guarantee that he will be the Minister who will guide the regulations through all their stages and that the assurances and the insight into his thinking that he has given us today will be the guiding influence throughout the development of the regulations.

Given that fact, it will be of great importance that the House is given the opportunity at every possible stage of knowing what is in Minister's minds and how their thinking is developing, especially in view of representations such as those made just now by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) about specific groups that may have a real interest in amending and developing the regulations to suit their own needs, to say nothing of taxi drivers. I have not heard anyone answer the point that I made in an intervention about mini cabs, and whether they will be regarded as different from taxis. Such matters will have to be considered and it will be of the greatest importance that we are made aware early on of the way in which thinking is developing.

11.30 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I should like to be helpful to my hon. Friend because he has raised an important point, which I should have liked to cover at some length, but it was difficult to do so under the new clause and the associated amendments.

We have given clear assurances on the question of wide consultation, and the Act of Parliament requires consultation anyway. It will include a consultation document, which will be laid in the Library of the House of Commons and will be available to Members of Parliament. We shall give as much publicity as possible to the consultation process. We shall also try to make sure that our conclusions after the consultation are made known before we introduce the regulations.

I should have liked to discuss the matter at greater length, as we did in Committee, but new clause 1 is about the affirmative resolution procedure, which has been accepted by those who have spoken in the debate. The only remaining issue is whether there should be a three-year experiment, and I have given the argument against that.

I should like to make just one other point because most matters have been dealt with fully and there are many other amendments to be discussed, which will have to be dealt with in detail. We must consider carefully the European dimension of such legislation. With 1992 very much in mind, increasingly we shall have to be aware of the extent to which measures that we take in a public arena such as this are in harmony with those that may apply at the European level. We are not yet satisfied that enough thought has been given to that. The promoter of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day), has not mentioned it yet, but he may take the opportunity to do so. The Minister has not done so. It has been touched upon only lightly. We should be foolish to go too far down the road of detailed regulations at this stage.

Perhaps this is one of the answers to the Minister's point about a three-year trial period. It would take from when the Bill comes into effect until 1992, which would give us the opportunity to appraise the way in which the legislation was working. We could have another look at it in view of everything that we are trying to achieve, with the free movement of trade, in 1992. So I give that answer to the Minister when he says that we have not had such a trial period before. We have not had 1992 before, nor have we been faced with the rapid development of the harmonisation concept across Europe. We are dealing with vehicles, traffic regulations and individual freedom, so I should have thought that the European dimension was of the greatest importance.

For all those reasons, I support my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley in new clause 1 and I pay tribute to what the hon. Member for Bradford, South told the House. I thank the Minister for accepting what has been said.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I support the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) about the relative merits of the affirmative and negative resolution procedures. When important legislation is being considered, most hon. Members are too familiar with the practice of Governments of all political persuasions to slip through secondary legislation which has serious consequences. Because the promoter of the Bill, the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day), has accepted the merits of the argument, he does the House a great service and thereby strengthens the case for the legislation.

The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) knows that my view is that there is no merit in his proposal that there should be a three-year trial period. That would merely allow those who have acted with self-indulgence on the issue to go through the same routine once again in three years' time.

There is a widespread understanding of the Bill's merits. The limited number of bogus statistics that have been produced to try to contradict the case would no doubt be produced three years into any trial period, but they could not disprove the case about the benefits of child restraints.

Mr. Waller: I do not recall whether the hon. Gentleman contributed to it, but the debate on renewing the regulations was useful and provided an opportunity for statistics to be produced and argued about, and for road safety issues to be considered by the House. There are not so many opportunities for such issues to come before the House. So I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman feels that another debate would be pointless. Debates have been useful previously.

Mr. Lloyd: If the hon. Gentleman manages to persuade his Government to have a debate on road safety, the Opposition would be more than happy to take part, but it should not be on the specific issue of renewing the regulations once they have been in force for three years. That is the distinction that the hon. Gentleman must accept.

I do not think that it would serve any purpose if I were to detain the House any longer on an issue that has received a thorough airing.

Mrs. Wise: I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). I assure him that in future I shall take the daily statutory instruments list, and I shall recommend all my hon. Friends to do so. My hon. Friend made me shiver in my shoes at the thought of what I had been missing.

I assure hon. Members that I am extremely interested in road safety. Indeed, the Minister and I correspond from time to time on the matter. He knows that, as a general rule, I am also in favour of compulsion in road safety. I do not regard myself as a "libertarian". I am in favour, for instance, of the helpful regulations that the Minister introduced to ensure that there are mandatory speed limits in contraflows.

I started by being favourably disposed towards the Bill and I looked at the amendments with great scepticism. However, I now think that there is much more merit in the criticism than I at first realised, and I have become extremely worried. I am afraid that the sponsors of the Bill and the Minister have not addressed my anxieties. I veer from side to side, thinking, "Are we passing something impossibly draconian? Are we passing something eminently reasonable?" through to, "Are we passing anything at all?" My last point is relevant to the regulations.

I was worried that I did not know what the Bill contained because it depended so much on regulations. Now I am worried about whether the Bill exists at all because I do not know whether there will ever be any regulations at all, good, bad or indifferent. The Minister has not allayed my anxiety and I must rely on what he said in Committee. He said:

> "The powers that the Bill would introduce are the same as those that we already have in respect of adults travelling in the rear of cars. We have not used those powers and we have no plan to do so. I believe that timing is critical."

The Minister said that one reason why we have a high compliance rate is that we were in tune with the climate of opinion when the law was introduced. He continued:

> "For the time being, I want to continue to do everything I can to encourage voluntary use of rear restraints by adults. . . There is a growing body of public opinion that we should move towards obligatory use of rear restraints by children. The Bill reflects that shift."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 27 April 1988; c. 10.]

I did not think that the Bill was about moving towards that, and general propaganda. If that is the intention behind it, I am not worried because I am completely in favour of seat belts and restraints for children.

Mr. Day: So what is the problem?

Mrs. Wise: I am describing what the problem is. If the hon. Gentleman had put more thought into this, he could have produced a better Bill which we could have insisted the Government should activate. We are debating we know not what. We started by discussing matters that are contained in regulations, whether there should be explanatory statements and how much consultation there should be. Then I was electrified to find when I read the Committee reports that the Minister is not contemplating introducing any regulations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have a moving group of people interested in this subject and one needs to take the Second Reading together with the Committee stage for enlightenment. If Parliament gives the Government the power to introduce regulations for exemptions for certain categories, which is what the whole regulation-making power is about, the Government's intention would be to activate the Bill so that children must wear restraints, where they are fitted, unless they are covered by an exemption category. I hope that makes the position plain. The distinction that I drew in Committee about the position of adults was that the Government did not intend to be unnecessarily draconian in proposing exemption regulations to Parliament.

Mrs. Wise: There seem to be far more good reasons for activating regulations in relation to adults than in relation to certain categories of children because with adults regulations can be enforced. If we pass Bills or regulations which may not be reasonable and certainly are not workable or enforceable, it will bring our laws into disrepute, and that is a serious matter.

Mr. Day: These matters were covered fully on Second Reading. If the hon. Lady takes the time and trouble to read Hansard, she will see that all these matters, including enforcement, were covered not only by me in a lengthy speech, which I do not propose to make again today, but by other hon. Members from both sides of the divide on this question. The Hon. Lady is dragging out the proceedings unnecessarily.

Mrs. Wise: The matter before us is not the hon. Gentleman's speech on Second Reading, but the Bill which he has introduced. The Government's intentions in relation to the Bill and the regulations are not as meritorious as some of the arguments used to promulgate them.

I read the briefing from the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety and I agree with everything in it, but it does not meet my anxieties. The Minister said that it was up to Parliament to decide what to do with the Bill and that it was up to the Government to decide what regulations to introduce if the Bill passes successfully through both Houses. We have heard how unsatisfactory our procedures are for regulations, even under the affirmative procedure. They receive cursory examination. This is the only opportunity that the House has to show what bothers us and what must be dealt with when regulations are introduced.

11.45 am

Sweeping statements have been made in response to anxieties, such as that we can rely on the police and the courts to use common sense. It is a worthy virtue, but it is not always the most useful for dealing with immediate problems with kids. Looking back to my children's childhood, I must admit that I am horrified at the attitude that we all had before seat belts became the order of the day. I will take second place to no one in my advocacy of wearing restraints. That is not the problem. The question is, what is the most effective way of bringing that about?

Children are not passive. They are not parcels that can be wrapped up neatly and trussed for transit. At a relatively early age they develop views, abilities and capacities of their own. I do not think that there is any sign that that problem is being taken on board and it makes me wonder whether it is humanly possible to produce regulations which are sufficiently tight to have any effect. They may be so riddled with exceptions as to give people he impression that there is as much to be said for breaching them as for observing them. I do not want that to happen.

It would be easy for us all if the hon. Gentleman had introduced a Bill about babies——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is going wide of the Bill, let alone new clause 1.

Mrs. Wise: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I shall try to show the relevance of my point.

Much of the discussion about the sort of regulations which can be introduced, statements on consultation and whether there should be an experimental period, relates to the problems which will face the Government in drafting adequate regulations. Whereas parents and drivers can be completely in control of what happens to infants in a rear seat because infants can be trussed for transit, that is not the case when a child reaches an age when, for example, it can unbuckle a belt or it develops views about how co-operative it will be. The problem with the Bill is that if children aged 10 or 13 years know that there is a danger that their parents may be regarded as breaking the law, it will encourage a sort of daring and defiant approach in them. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) eloquently said, regulations should not be a series of loopholes. I prefer regulations that are more limited in scope—such as those relating to babies could be, which are and should be enforceable—to those that take on a range of issues that are better left to persuasion.

I am not sure that we are right to discard easily the idea of an experimental period. I would be happier if I could see more clearly what is likely to result from our deliberations. The problem is that none of us can see what will result. The new clause and the amendments are a brave attempt to clarify matters.

Initially, I was in favour of the Bill and I took it for granted that there were no problems with it. It was only when I examined it carefully—starting from the position of being in favour of this compulsory measure—that I realised that it might not be appropriate. I have not received from the Minister any clear idea about how he will cope with the problems. We could not expect him to lay the regulations before us in detail, but he could have said that the problems are capable of solution.

I am against passing legislation that calls on the Government to take measures that cannot reasonably be taken. It is all very well for Conservative Members to say that the Government will consider the regulations, but I do not have such faith in the Government. I am worried that the Bill will fail to introduce——

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Earlier in today's proceedings my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) raised a point of order about the threatened closure of the KP factory in her constituency which employs——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I can help the hon. Gentleman if he will allow me to.

I have had two points of order from the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon). No breach of order of the House has been committed. Mr. Speaker has received no application from a Minister to come to the House. I can take no further points of order on that matter.

12.15 pm

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is not the chicanery obvious—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name him."]—in view of the fact that the last new clause was debated for almost two and half hours and the major speakers in that debate were people who believe in murder in the womb?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been in the Chair since early this morning. The last group of amendments were correctly debated.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You may recall that, to save time, I agreed to withdraw the three amendments in my name in favour of amendment No. 18. Is amendment No. 18 accepted by agreement, or will it be taken at the end?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It will be taken at the end, when we reach it on the Amendment Paper. Mr. Speaker has agreed that it is possible to have a vote on amendment No. 18 if that is the will of the House.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you heard the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) make an allegation to the effect that those hon. Members who spoke in the earlier debate were in favour of murdering babies——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. As I keep saying, no breach of our Standing Orders has been committed and I have correctly responded to the point of order correctly made by the hon. Member for Rochdale. That is over.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I make no allegations, but we all know what has been happening. When I came into the Chamber earlier in the debate, the majority of hon. Members present were opponents of the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, which was subjected to the same time treatment——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the right hon. Gentleman to discuss legislation which is not before us. It is in the best interests of the House and every hon. Member in it, irrespective of their views on these matters, for us to proceed with the Bill before us.

Mr. Madden: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. With the greatest respect, the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith), who was not in the Chamber during the debate and did not contribute to it—that does not apply to other hon. Members who sought to raise points of order—made an allegation against hon. Members who have been in the Chamber and who have contributed to the debate. Indeed, the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) who spoke for longest during the debate on the new clause and amendments, made clear at the beginning of his speech that he was a supporter of the Bill with which the hon. Member for Rochdale is concerned. I spoke in the debate for eight minutes on behalf of my constituents, who are very concerned about certain provisions of the Bill that we are now debating. I find it grossly offensive to be accused by the hon. Member for Rochdale of being in favour of murdering babies. Therefore I ask you, Madam Deputy Speaker, with the greatest respect, to ask the hon. Member for Rochdale to withdraw the allegation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have listened to all these points of order. There is no question of me asking an hon. Member to withdraw his remarks. [Interruption.] It would be in the best interest of the House for all those who are interested in this Bill, and the others that are to come before us, to get on with it.

Clause 1

COMPULSORY WEARING OF REAR SEAT BELTS BY CHILDREN

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 1, line 9, after 'fitted', insert 'or has been fitted at any time'.

I shall not attempt to delay the procedings. I want the Bill to reach the statute book. It is a pleasure to speak in this debate, especially after my frustrating experience yesterday. I sat through the debate on prisons because I wanted to make an important speech about the spread of AIDS in prisons and from there to the public outside, but I was not called. I sat through the next debate, too, on the City of London (Spitalfields Market) Bill, which affects my constituents. I was called to speak in that debate but I had only 30 seconds. The frustration left me with a sore throat. Despite the amendments that I have tabled to this Bill, I thought that again I would not be called. The frustration made me think that I was beginning to develop a sore throat. I need the regular exercise of speaking in the House to avoid such frustration.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) on his choice of subject. The Bill is full of good intentions. The Bill was not thoroughly debated in Committee. I noted that in Committee the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said that the last time a similar Bill was debated in Committee, five sittings were devoted to it. There was only one Committee sitting on this Bill. Consequently, on Report and Third Reading there must be a full debate. If not, the consequences will be serious. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) made that point earlier today.

The Bill is intended to save children's lives. In Committee, the Minister said that last year 60 children were killed and 7,000 injured when travelling unrestrained in the back of cars. Those figures are horrendous. Many of the children were killed or injured in low-speed crashes. As I came to the House this morning, I saw a little girl in the back of a car. She was bobbing up and down just as her father manoeuvred dangerously into a bus lane. A car or a skip might have been parked there, and there could have been an accident. I hope that the Minister will take action about unlighted skips that cause many accidents in my constituency and elsewhere.

My hon. Friends and I are worried about the abuse of police powers. During the miners' strike the police used all sorts of excuses to pull up miners while they were travelling in cars. If legislation of this kind had been on the statute book then, they might have used it to pull up miners who had children in the backs of their cars. We are worried about the injustice that could be caused through sheer spite. However, the police complaints procedure has been improved. It could be improved further. We have to decide whether injustice should be tolerated if lives can be saved. The saving of life comes out on top. Despite the good intentions of the hon. Member for Cheadle, there are gaping loopholes in the Bill. My amendment seeks to close them and to improve the Bill.

New clause 2 provides that all motor car manufacturers that do not fit rear seat belts can be fined £1,000. Unfortunately, that new clause has not been called. I wanted to fill a loophole. I understand that this is no excuse for not doing it in the Bill. Some motor car manufacturers are anti-social when it comes to their profits and want to maximise them regardless of the safety implications. It is similar to the approach to unleaded petrol. Earlier this week, my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) went to a seminar of motor car manufacturers to point out that a pathetic number of cars are produced to run on unleaded petrol, although the Chancellor boasted in his Budget speech about the improvements that there would be.

The amendment will prevent people ripping out rear seat belts just to get round the law. This may be done by second-hand car salesmen—a much maligned group who, despite doing a decent job to make a living, have a reputation for being unscrupulous. I recall that President Nixon was linked to second-hand car salesman. It was asked: "Would you buy a used car from this man?" In that case, it was proved true that one should not. A car without rear seat belts may be used as a selling point and be sold more cheaply. I am tempted to say that we may well have to apply the test: "Would you buy a used car from this man?" to the next leader of the Social and Liberal Democrats, but we shall see what happens. A clever solicitor may use the fact that seat belts have been ripped out to get round the law.

Legislation with loopholes may result in extra administration and costs to the police and courts, to no good effect. The original purpose of the legislation may not be achieved. Our job is to close loopholes. I am prepared to withdraw the amendment if the hon. Member for Cheadle can give me an assurance that he will carefully consider the matter and try to close this loophole with an amendment in the other place.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) said, I think, that he was withdrawing the amendment—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us get this absolutely right. The hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) asked for assurances before he would withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman asked for assurances from my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day). Vehicles registered after April 1987 must have rear seat belts fitted. Vehicles registered before do not. The amendment would be impracticable. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle may be able to give assurances that he will continue to consider the point, but the Government's clear advice is that it would make the law unenforceable, and it is important to have an enforceable law to meet the main aim of those who support the Bill, which is that more children should be protected more often.

12.30 pm

Mr. Forth: I am slightly confused. I was waiting for the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) to explain what his amendment involved and what its aim was, but he did not do so. There may be some substance in the amendment. I thought that the hon. Gentleman might say that if people removed seat belts already fitted in a vehicle with a view to evading the purpose of the Bill, the amendment would catch them. He referred to a loophole and I assume that that is the one that he meant, in which case there is an interesting divergence of view between the hon. Member for Leyton and the Minister.

I cannot imagine why my hon. Friend the Minister did not want to explain his views rather more fully. Let us suppose that there are anchorages or fixing points in the rear of the vehicle and someone removes the seat belts to exploit the loophole to which the hon. Member for Leyton referred. I should have thought that it was an eminently enforceable, checkable and policeable proposition to say that it would be possible to establish that that had happened. If a vehicle was involved in a road traffic accident involving injury, the police could readily satisfy themselves whether the vehicle contained anchorage or fixing points for seat belts and whether those seat belts had been removed from it.

Mr. Stern: My hon. Friend is being carried away by flights of fancy. I have just purchased a second-hand car. Under the amendment, I would have had to ask the previous owner whether there had ever been belts in the car. As he is dead, I might have some difficulties. Whatever the merits of the amendment, it is wholly unenforceable in law. I invite the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) to drop it so that we can get on.

Mr. Forth: I do not think that my hon. Friend is right. Even though he may not be gifted with great mechanical knowledge or interest, I am sure that by looking at the car even superficially he could satisfy himself that rear seat belts had been fitted or that provision had been made for them. That is not an unreasonable or impossible request. I believe that there is substance in the amendment. I am not satisfied with the peremptory way in which the Minister has dismissed it. He has not satisfied me. I wonder whether he has satisfied the House——

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I am satisfied.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Lady may be satisfied, but I am not.

Mr. Day: If my hon. Friend will allow it, I would like the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) to tell us whether he is satisfied and will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend makes a reasonable point. If the hon. Member for Leyton had explained the matter a little more fully, and if it had been dealt with in a more leisurely manner rather than in an unseemly rush, probably we could have resolved it. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) must restrain himself. He was getting excited and encouraging the hon. Member for Leyton to go a little more quickly than was strictly necessary. Let me give my hon. Friend some advice. If he allowed the matter to unfold in the fullness of time, he might find that we progress rather more quickly than we are at present. I have been provoked quite needlessly to my feet, partly because the hon. Member for Leyton could not fully explain the amendment and partly because the Minister gave a most unsatisfactory response.

Ms. Short: I shall attempt to help the hon. Gentleman. I heard both the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) and the Minister's response. At first it seemed to me that there was a loophole and that people could remove seat belts and prevent the law from being implemented. The Minister then explained that the law already provides that every car produced after 1986-87 must have rear seat belts. That is an absolute requirement. Therefore, if one removes them, one is in breach of the law. That is a better, neater and tighter way of achieving the object of the amendment.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the hon. Lady who, in her inimitably elegant way, has made in an intervention points that she might have been tempted to make in a speech. She may still be tempted to make a speech——

Ms. Short indicated dissent.

Mr. Forth: That is not the case. However, if the hon. Member for Leyton were to wish to withdraw his amendment, he would have to ask the leave of the House. I am not prepared to give him my leave to withdraw it unless the Minister can satisfy me about why the point that he made about unenforceability is relevant——

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The point that I should like to share with my hon. Friend—I think that I have already shared it with the House—is that there is no loophole. Vehicles registered after April 1987 must have rear seat belts fitted. The provisions of this Bill would then have effect. There is no practical way of knowing whether vehicles registered before 1987 had previously had restraints fitted. Let us suppose, for example, that a previous owner had a rear-facing infant carrier as part of the car and that that was taken away when the car was sold. Tracking back through the vehicle's history is unenforceable. I spoke briefly because I thought that my explanation was clear.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is now suggesting that I alone was unable to follow his clear explanation. That is typical of my hon. Friend's incisiveness, elegance of thought and ability to put me down without any great effort. However, I am still not happy because I still believe—I shall make this point only once again because I do not want to delay the House—that many types of fittings for rear seat belts would leave a clear trace on the vehicle—for example, mounting points or drilled holes. I should have thought that it would be eminently easy to trace whether there had been a fitting before.

As I seem to be the only hon. Member who can see that point I do not think that it is right to pursue it. I shall trust, as I nearly always do, my hon. Friend the Minister and leave the matter in his safe hands, and I shall leave the matter, as I sometimes do, to the judgment of the hon. Member for Leyton and my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle, the promoter of the Bill, to see whether they can sort it out between them, given the hints that I have dropped.

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend the Minister is right that there could certainly be some enforcement difficulties. I compliment the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on his approach. I know that he is a sincere and objective supporter of the Bill and I am grateful for his support. I hope that, in view of the Minister's explanation, which I found satisfactory, the hon. Gentleman will feel able to withdraw his amendment and allow us to proceed.

Mr. Cohen: I am prepared to withdraw the amendment. It was important to air the matter and to hear what the Minister had to say. We shall read carefully his comments about unenforceability and, if need be, the matter can be raised in another place. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Waller: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 1, line 11, leave out 'under the age of' and insert 'between the ages of three and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 13, in page 1, line 11, leave out 'fourteen' and insert 'sixteen'.

Mr. Waller: I recall the words of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster who, in 1980, was the Minister for Roads and Traffic. He drew attention to the fact that it could be dangerous to require a small child to wear a seat belt that was not intended for a child. He stated:

"If the belt is worn in such a way that it is across the neck of the child, the belt is a positive danger."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 23 January 1980; c. 84]

In the regulations that we are to lay before the House—we do not have an opportunity at this stage to know exactly what form they will take—my hon. Friend the Minister is to state what types of belt should be worn in what circumstances. Presumably there will be some reference to the ages and sizes of children.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Would it not be advisable to specify in the regulations that alternative linkage points should be provided? From my experience of adult seat belts, I know that cars are not designed for short fat ladies. The belt cuts across my neck and in an accident I should probably be decapitated. Some newer cars provide alternative linkage points so that people can choose the one that suits them best, but it is not a requirement for all cars. With children, who vary greatly in size according to their age, it is even more important to provide alternative fixing points for seat belts.

Mr. Waller: I agree with the hon. Lady about the importance of that. Indeed, in my discussions, I have had many complaints about the difficulty of fitting children into certain types of restraint. The search must continue for better types of restraint so that children can be secured safely and the task is less ardous for parents. Parents would then be more willing to undertake the task and the children might be more comfortable and thus less anxious to extricate themselves in the way that I described earlier.

The regulations will evitably be somewhat complicated. My hon Friend the Minister has confirmed that if restraints are fitted they will be required to be worn. As there is no compulsion for child restraints to be fitted, some parents, guardians or drivers may decide, as they will be legally entitled to decide, not to put in special child safety restraints. I understand that such restraints are quite expensive and although one or two companies have very good schemes enabling parents to obtain them on hire or lease, some parents will simply not do so and there is no requirement that they should. The regulations being somewhat complicated, it seems reasonable to assume that some drivers will believe that because there are belts in the car those belts must be worn by children too young or too small to wear them safely. That is a matter of considerable concern, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and many others have pointed out, that that could constitute a positive danger to some children.

Mrs. Wise: The difficulties that the hon. Gentleman describes are mechanical aspects of design and thus capable of being overcome in the ways suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon). Does the hon. Gentleman agree that babies are most capable of being safely restrained and that the advantage of this legislation will be that children grow up with the habit of being restrained and parents will acquire the expectation that restraints should be provided? The hon. Gentleman's amendment seems to go in the opposite direction. Has he considered those points?

Mr. Waller: I entirely agree and I would firmly advise anyone with any doubt on the matter that they should ensure that any child, virtually from birth, is securely restrained. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) has stated positively, however, that there is no intention of making it a legal requirement at this time to fit such equipment. That being so, whether we like it or not, inevitably there will be some cars where that equipment is not fitted.

Also, parents who normally carry teenagers, who could happily wear a normal belt, may occasionally find that they have to carry a baby or a toddler in the rear, but they do not have the suitable fitting. There is no proposal that such a fitting should be required. If there are no belts, it will be permissible for the child to be carried in the rear of the vehicle.

Even if my hon. Friend the Minister introduces regulations that specify an exemption for a child of under three or four to be carried, there is always a danger, because parents cannot be expected to be familiar with the detailed regulations but may know from the Bill that there is a requirement that, if belts are fitted, they should be worn. Therefore, they may perhaps wrongly rely on the standard equipment that is now required to be fitted to all motor vehicles.

Mrs. Wise: Will not the hon. Gentleman join some of us in urging that the regulations should ensure that appropriate fittings for infants are included, along with the compulsory fittings for adults? Is not that the way in which we should proceed? Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that it is babies who are more vulnerable because they are the lightest? It is easier for them to be thrown through the roof or the windscreen.

Mr. Waller: Indeed. We have all seen the horrific films of mock-ups, with babies being thrown forward through the windscreen of a car. I particularly condemn adults who hold a baby in front of them, perhaps in the front of the car. In many cases a baby has been killed by the weight of an adult or crushed between the adult and the dashboard or windscreen, but most often the baby is thrown forward through the windscreen.

We know from experience that if a person is ejected from a vehicle, especially a baby, his chances of survival are much less. I remember cases on motorways of children, because of a sudden change of direction, being ejected from a car and not surviving.

In 1980 the Department of Transport produced a draft document, which said:

"People under 5 feet in height (including children) may be unable to wear a seat belt without discomfort because the diagonal strap lies too high on the body."

I reiterate the need to devise better fittings in future, which can be adjusted. However, unfortunately, we are not talking about the ideal; we are talking about the present law and how parents and drivers will deal with the law as set out in the Bill.

We have no opportunity to see the proposed regulations and it now appears that there will be no statement before they are laid, so we have to take the Bill at face value. Parents or drivers might make the reasonable assumption that they must use a belt, whatever it may be, because it is fitted. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle has said time and again that if a belt is fitted, it is required to be worn. That is why I tabled the amendment.

I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle and the Minister have to say. The great risk with such legislation is that it is not clear and we can read into it what we will. We do not know what the regulations may be and we fear that if they are not straightforward—I do not see how they can be, bearing in mind the different permutations for which one would have to make allowances—we may well put children into greater danger than they are in without the legislation.

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has taken great interest in the Bill from the word go and I have no doubt that his intentions are honourable. Indeed, on many occasions his contributions have been constructive and helpful. But with all due respect, the matter in amendment No. 20 is undoubtedly best considered in regulations and I should like to make some suggestions about what the regulations might be.

The choice of three years in the amendment is arbitrary, and I cannot see why that period has been chosen. Equally, what the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) said about babies being at risk is correct. There is no reason why the Bill should exclude babies and toddlers in appropriate restraints. There is certainly no published evidence to suggest that the use of adult belts by small children increases the risk of serious or fatal injury. However, there is mixed opinion about whether parents should be given no option but to restrain their children in this manner. That matter should be covered by regulations.

Mr. Waller: My right hon. and learned Friend the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that it would be a positive danger if belts were worn the wrong way and across the neck of a child. It has been suggested by a former transport Minister, who has studied the matter with care, that we could therefore put a child into greater danger, despite our best intentions.

Mr. Day: That is indeed a correct quotation, but my right hon. and learned Friend was referring to a belt not applied appropriately; it is not said that it is dangerous to use an adult belt. Many types of equipment can be dangerous if used incorrectly, so that is not a relevant criticism of the Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the law relating to chidren in front seats of cars already stipulates that they must wear seat belts and that there is little record of any serious or minor injury to children wearing adult seat belts in front seats?

Mr. Day: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct.

I see no reason why regulations should not take account of this important question and why babies under one year old should not have an approved infant carrier or carry-cot restraint. I see no reason why for children aged between one and four any type of approved child restraint should not be suitable. For children between the ages of five and 13 any type of approved child restraint or adult seat belt is suitable. If we approach the matter from that angle, bearing in mind that the Minister has the best interests of children at heart and has given assurances that he will consult widely, the amendment is unnecessary. I hope that the House will oppose it.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): As, alas, the attempts of hon. Members who supported the Abortion (Amendment) Bill are to be thwarted, I feel some relief from the obligation that I placed on myself not to speak in this debate. Perhaps I may address a few remarks to the amendment, which I support.

My bona fides of interest in this subject stretch back many years—before most Opposition Members appeared in the House. I have exercised enormous self-restraint since my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) introduced the Bill. Although the inevitability of life and the decision of the House in making the wearing of seat belts compulsory lead us to the next stage of accepting that that compulsion will apply to children, it should not lead us to produce legislation that is nonsense. We must try to ensure that legislation makes sense, is reasonable and practicable and will last some time on the statute book.

I support the amendment. Nonsense is inherent in the Bill about the age at which children are expected to wear belts because there is to be no compulsory fitting of seat belts suitable for small children. Under the Bill, parents will feel obliged to use seat belts for their children, and that may cause them considerable danger.

I recall that for many years the RAC opposed the compulsory wearing of sealt belts, principally because it thought it was quite immoral to oblige people to wear belts that might kill them. We have discussed the matter further over the years and, more recently, the then Minister responsible for the legislation, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, said:

"If the belt is worn in such a way that it is across the neck of the child, the belt is a positive danger . . . With the exception of the tiny child, it is possible to adjust the belt and the way that the child is sitting so as to make the belt a positive protection."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 23 January 1980; c. 84.]

He was saying that a seat belt could be reasonably adjusted, but not for a tiny child. I should have thought that that was manifest good sense—as is anything that my right hon. and learned Friend says. It is self-evident that one cannot safely put a tiny child in a seat belt that is not specifically tailored for it.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) intervened earlier and said, if I understood him correctly, that it is necessary for children sitting in the front seat to wear a seat belt and that there is no evidence of any great harm being done to them. The answer is that no parent with a ha'porth of commonsense or concern for the safety of their tiny child would dream of putting it in the front seat of a motor car unless the child was being held or restrained by an adult, and the dangers of that are self-evident. The hon. Member for Huddersfield has a long history of interest in this subject, and much knowledge about it, but what he suggested has never been tested. Tests would arise only under the Bill.

My first objection to the Bill and reason for supporting the amendment is that to leave matters as they are is manifestly an invitation to danger for small children. Although those of us discussing these matters are very sensible, intelligent and reasonable I am afraid that one cannot always say that about everyone in society. I have seen the most unbelievable things happening in cars where parents have obviously not exercised any common sense over the way in which their very small children behave. It is perfectly possible for a parent to believe that the law states that they must wear a seat belt and that therefore their children must also wear one. Therefore the seat belt in the car must be put round the child no matter how old that child is. The courts are full of stupid, irresponsible, thoughtless and senseless parents who have behaved in a way in which some people may consider to be grossly negligent, if not criminal, with regard to very small children. That is life. That is what happens.

I am afraid that if there is no qualification in this legislation to the effect that people with very small children need to have a seat belt fixed in the rear which is not meant for a very small child, very small children will inevitably sit in the back of cars wearing seat belts that are wholly inappropriate and dangerous to those children. That is why we should amend this part of the Bill.

Mr. Day: My hon. and learned Friend said that if the Bill is left as it is it will be an invitation to danger. That is an incredible statement to make about a Bill designed to protect the lives of young children. Surely the greatest danger for children would occur if the Bill did not become an Act. It is essential that the Bill is successful.

My hon. and learned Friend also said that the courts are full of people who have not complied with the law. He must accept that the present seat belt law is self-enforcing, and this legislation would be the same. In an opinion poll on this matter 90 per cent. of parents said that they saw the logic in compulsory restraint of their children. How on earth can my hon. and learned Friend claim that the courts will be full of people who will not comply with this?

Mr. Lawrence: I apologise if my lack of practice in dealing with these matters has caused me to express myself so badly. My hon. Friend misunderstands me. I do not for one moment doubt his bona fides and good intentions, which all of us share. It is very important that, in practice, we should protect our children from danger. However, there is a gap between that excellent intention, which we all share, and the practice that will emerge from the Bill. We must get the practice right. No amount of good intentions will save children's lives if they are put in danger in practice.

There is another danger facing a small child wearing an unsuitable belt. I am not referring to the fact that the child may be thrown from the back seat to the front and somehow damaged, or thrown into the well in the back seat area and hurt. I am referring to the fact that the child may be strangled by the belt if he is caught in a crash and minutes pass before he can be released from the wreckage.

That is why we must be particularly careful that the legislation makes practical sense. We all agree that the end in view is the safety of children and I do not for a moment resile from the necessity of such a measure being introduced if it is practical.

Mrs. Gorman: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of a case reported in the newspapers recently where such a tragedy occurred? A very small child was belted in the rear of a car that was involved in an accident. The child could not be released and the mother watched her child burn to death because it was strapped into the back seat.

Mr. Lawrence: We can always find examples to support either side of the argument. My hon. Friend has put a finger on a particular case, underlining and supporting the point I was making.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I hope to say a word or two later, but I intervene now because I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) was referring to a widely publicised tragic accident in which a child was burn to death when the car in which it was travelling was hit by another. However, subsequent expert investigations revealed that no child restraint had been fitted.

Mr. Lawrence: That shows that particular examples raised by one side of the House or the other may not always be reliable. Ultimately, we must rely on our own experience and common sense.

My first, and most important, single objection is that if we are not careful in introducing an amendment, we may put on to the statute book a measure that would result in causing the death or injury of the very children whom we seek to protect—principally, very young children who would not normally wear an adult restraint of the type most of us have in mind.

My second objection is that the Bill as drafted places an obligation upon the driver to excuse himself. He is required to explain why a child under the age of 14, being carried in a car in which a seat belt was fitted, was not properly restrained by it. That transfers the burden in a criminal matter to the accused. The essence of our law is that the burden is on the prosecution to prove guilt. It is not just a matter of theory. If there were to be any other general principle, we would need 10,000 times the number of courts that we have now.

Ms. Short: The hon. and learned Gentleman should be in favour of that.

Mr. Lawrence: No—I do not invite any more competition.

If we required people to give an account of themselves every time that we did not like what they were doing, because it was allegedly contrary to some supposed idea of the law, the legal system would become impossible to administer. There is a practical reason why the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to establish guilt. There is also the question of civil liberties, but I shall not waste the time of the House now in describing why that is so. Courts are very jealous about creating too many situations in which the obligation is upon the accused person to give an account of himself, even if that account does not have to satisfy the court beyond reasonable doubt but only on the balance of probabilities.

There are many examples, though again I shall not take up the time of the House describing them all, where that burden of proof is reversed. It is always reversed where it is manifestly unjust or impossible for the law to be enforced unless a serious obligation is placed on the accused to explain himself—such as in cases involving the possession of an offensive weapon. If it is manifestly clear that it is an offensive weapon, obviously a person should be in possession of it in public only if he has some important excuse; the burden is on that person to explain himself.

What on earth is the justification for allowing the police to bring a prosecution against a person whose child was not restrained by a seat belt fitted in the rear of the vehicle? Why should such a person be required to go to court and offer a reasonable excuse? Why should the burden be transferred in that way? Why change the whole tenor of British law? Some of us have warned that the point will soon be reached where practically every item of legislation passed by the House will require that defendants give a reasonable excuse for their actions. This seems a splendid example. We have got into the habit of placing the burden of explanation on the accused, so it is very simple to put it into the Bill. I am against that on principle: I do not think that we should ever transfer the burden, unless it is important for the securing of justice in a serious criminal matter.

Mr. Waller: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that particularly difficult circumstances would arise if the driver were accompanied by only one person—a young child? Would it not cause considerable problems for a child to be expected to come to court and respond to questioning? After all we are ultimately dealing with the criminal law.

Mr. Lawrence: My hon. Friend tempts me, but he must not. It is precisely that sort of question that triggers off a temptation in me to spend the next hour or two explaining exactly why what he says is right. But I must resist the urge, however tempting it is. I am merely outlining my objections. If I went into chapter and verse of why I am making them, we could carry on until the end of the sitting, and, if we had another day, until the end of that day as well. I am specifically restraining myself—as if I were wearing a seat belt! I shall move on quickly to my third objection.

My hon. Friend the Minister has just said—and will say it again, no doubt—that these fears are unfounded, because provision will be made by regulation. I feel, however, that we must stop legislating by regulation. It is all too easy for the Government to say, "Give us the powers and we will regulate." The trouble with regulations is that we debate them from 10 pm until 11.30 pm or even later, and some of us who wish to speak are unable to catch Mr. Speaker's eye. Regulations are an entirely inappropriate method of legislation, unless there is no other way.

Although I have the greatest confidence in my hon. Friend the Minister, and in the likelihood that the regulations will receive the widest consultation and magnificent support from everyone and every organisation, I do not know how long he will be Transport Minister. I do not know whether I shall feel the same confidence in his successor, or in his successor's successor. I do not even know whether, when the matter is implemented by regulation, the same Government will be in office—although I am of course as confident as it is possible to be. [Interruption.] I hope that I shall not be tempted down that line, because I know that you would stop me, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Government by regulation is government by ignorance. We who are passing the laws now are ignorant of what will be in future regulations. We are signing a blank cheque.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman is now straying to the merits and demerits of regulations in general. He must direct his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Lawrence: I am grateful to you Mr. Deputy Speaker, for bringing me into line, and I shall direct my remarks specfically to the amendment. My hon. Friend the Minister will say that I have no need to fear the use of rear restraints for tiny tots, because he will make a regulation.
